THE SUBJECTS OF THE CASES

REPORTED IN THIS VOLUME.

ADMINISTRATION.
Bankruptcy and Chancery rules as to distribution of surplus—Insolvent estate—Master's certificate—Estate originally insolvent enabled through fund falling in to pay principal of all debts—Interest payable by law.—An estate originally insolvent, and so found by the master's certificate in an administration action, was augmented through a fund falling in through the court's setting aside a settlement, and so became able to pay the principal of all debts, but not the full interest even on debts that carried interest at law. Held, that interest must be paid according to the bankruptcy and not the Chancery rules. (Re Whitaker; Whitaker v. Palmer.)	277
Claim on estate—Compromise by executor of co-executor's claim—Parties acting honestly and reasonably.—Acting co-executors are seised of their office per vis et per tout , and where one of them, acting honestly and reasonably and to avoid the expense of litigation, has allowed the whole claim of his co-executor upon the estate of their testator such compromise will be upheld. (Re Houghton, deceased; Hawley v. Blake.)	252

AGREEMENT.
Building contract—Construction—Conclusiveness of architect's certificates—Limitation of right of action.—A condition of a building agreement stated that any defects which might appear within twelve months, and which arose, in the opinion of the architect, from materials or workmanship not in accordance with the drawings and specification or the instructions of the architect, should, upon the directions of the architect, be made good by the contractor at his own cost. A subsequent condition contained a proviso that "no certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement." Held, that this proviso did not deprive the architect's certificates of conclusiveness for all purposes, but only so as not to relieve the contractor from liability to make good defects as provided by the agreement—that is to say, as provided by the condition stated above. ARBITRATION.
Costs—Discretion of arbitrator—Award fees—Costs of reference.—Costs left to the discretion of the arbitrator, but not dealt with by him, only follow the event when the matter is referred by the court under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, and not when the action is stayed and arbitration is directed by the court under the submission of the parties, for to such a reference sect. 15 (2) does not apply. (Warburg and Co. v. McKerron and Co.)	644
Ouster of jurisdiction of the court—Deficiency in pleading—Waiver of right to object.—Where by private Acts of Parliament and a scheduled agreement regulating the rights and duties of the co-plaintiffs (traders and manufacturers at W. and the corporation of W.) and the defendants, it was in effect provided that any difference arising between the parties as to the statutes and agreement should be determined by arbitration, an action brought by the co-plaintiffs against the defendants in respect of a certain dispute between them arising under the statutes was ordered to be dismissed as between the corporation of W. and the defendants, and stayed until the determination by arbitration of the dispute as between the traders and manufacturers at W. and the defendants, the jurisdiction of the court being ousted, and no deficiency in pleading and no waiver by the parties could give such jurisdiction. (Joseph Crossfield and Sons Limited v. Manchester Ship Canal Company.)	557

ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT.
"Absolute assignment by writing"—Request to debtor to pay third person.—The defendants being indebted to K. for the price of goods sold, K. sent to the plaintiffs, for them to forward to the defendants, a letter, signed by him and addressed to the defendants, as follows: "Kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to" the plaintiffs. The attached letter, addressed to the plaintiffs, was as follows: "Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to the approval of the goods, the amount of invoices—viz., 369/ and 3263/—for seventy-five packages received from K. and Co., when due, direct to your good selves, for account of K. and Co." The plaintiffs sent these two documents to the defendants with a request to sign and return the counterpart. The counterpart was returned to the plaintiffs, but was signed by a person who had no authority to sign on behalf of the defendants. Held, that the two documents did not constitute "an absolute assignment" of the debt, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873. (Brandts, Sons, and Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Company Limited.) 106		of; it must be an address at which the debt can be paid or secured or compounded for, and of a place at which the creditor is to be found during the seven days limited by the notice, whether the address is of the residence or place of business of the creditor. If the address given in the notice is such an address at the date of the service of the notice, the occasional absence of the creditor from the place, even for a whole day, will not render the notice inefficient, unless the absence is such as to deprive the debtor of a reasonable opportunity of paying or securing or compounding for the sum due. It would not make any difference that the address was the temporary home of the creditor, who had no permanent home; or that his absence occurred on the last day of the seven. But if the creditor, after the service of the notice, abandons his place of address, so that it ceases to be a place where at reasonable times he, or some authorised agent on his behalf, can be found to receive payment of the debt, or to deal with the question of security, the bankruptcy notice will cease to be efficient. In July 1901 an action for libel was commenced, the defendant being described in the writ and the pleadings as "a married woman." At that date a decree nisi had been made for the dissolution of the defendant's marriage, and in Nov. 1901 the decree was made absolute. On the 30th Oct. 1902 the libel action was tried, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff with 5000 l. damages, and judgment was entered accordingly. In June 1903, on the application of the defendant, the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial unless the plaintiff consented to the damages being reduced to 1500 l. The plaintiff consented, and the judgment was on the 19th July amended accordingly, but on the date of the 30th Oct. was not altered. The judgment as drawn up was in the ordinary form of a judgment against an unmarried woman. The 1500 l. not having been paid, the plaintiff, on the 28th July, served a bankruptcy notice on the defendant claiming payment of the 1500 l. , with interest from the 30th Oct. 1902, the address of the creditor being given at an hotel in London, where she was then staying, and where she was in the habit of staying, but she did not permanently retain a room there. On the 4th Aug., the last of the seven days limited for compliance with the notice, the creditor left the hotel at 10.15 a.m., leaving no address. She went to Newhaven and thence to France, and did not return to England till the end of September. The debtor not having complied with the bankruptcy notice, on the 24th Aug. the creditor presented a bankruptcy petition against her, and a receiving order was made. Held, that, as at the date of the trial the defendant had been divorced and a judgment could have been obtained against her creating a personal debt, the fact that she was described in the writ and pleadings as a married woman, and the judgment was drawn up in the form applicable to an unmarried woman, was a matter of form only, and the Court of Bankruptcy had no power to go behind the judgment. Held also, that an objection that interest was claimed from the 30th Oct. 1902 instead of the 19th July 1903 was concluded by the judgment. Held also, that the address given in the notice was sufficient, and that the creditor did not abandon it when she left the hotel. (Re Beauchamp; Ex parte Beauchamp.) 594

BAILMENT.		Books kept by bankrupt as agent for several principals—Right to retain. —The bankrupt had been an underwriter at Lloyd's, and, in addition to his own business, had as agent underwritten policies for others. The agency agreements were in writing, and provided that the bankrupt should keep proper books, which should be open to his principals, and that they should be audited by accountants at the expense of the principals. Held, that the books were the property of the bankrupt, and that the accountants had no right against the trustee in bankruptcy to retain them on behalf of the principals. (Re Burnand; Ex parte The Trustee.) 292
Duty of bailor—Loan of chattel for consideration—Injury to chattel by negligence of bailor's servant—Act of servant outside the scope of his employment—Liability of bailor.—The plaintiff, who was a coachbuilder, lent a carriage to the defendant while the defendant's carriage was being repaired by the plaintiff. The defendant's coachman, without the knowledge or permission of the defendant, took out the carriage and went for a drive with some friends. In the course of the drive he negligently drove into a tramcar, and the carriage was damaged. In an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for the injury done to his carriage: Held, that, as the defendant had not personally been guilty of any negligence and as his coachman in taking out the carriage had acted outside the scope of his employment, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff for the damage done to the carriage. (Sanderson v. Collins.) 243
BANK.
Credit against production of documents—Certificate of analysis—Fraudulent misrepresentation—Duties and liabilities of bank.—A bank was authorised to advance a sum against production of documents. The mandate was as follows: "Negotiate drafts of A. O. at sight on D. Bank (Berlin) London agency p. 800 l. account B. S. (against) bill of lading, policy of insurance and certificate analysis from Dr. H. (for) 100 tons cobalt ore analysis not less than 5 per cent. protoxide shipped by steamer (to) Europe. Credit expires. . . . A. O. intended to ship worthless ore, and in the bill of lading it was described as "P.M. 2680 bags containing 100 tons cobalt ore." A policy of insurance was also effected. A sample of sound ore was submitted for analysis, which analysis the bank refused to accept, as the certificate did not refer to the bill of lading goods. A. O. then marked the sample as the bill of lading quantity was described. The analyst gave a second certificate, which was as follows: "Sample of cobalt ore marked 'P.M. 2680 bags representing 100 tons' received from you on the 12th July gave the following results: 4.14 per cent. cobalt, equal to 5.27 per cent. cobalt protoxide in the dry ore; 9.25 per cent. moisture." On producing the second certificate the bank paid A. O. 800 l. Subsequently A. O. was convicted of obtaining that money by fraudulent misrepresentation. Held, that the certificate on its face was regular and came within the meaning of the mandate, and there was no duty on the bank to see to the sampling. The bank was entitled to assume that the analyst had acted skilfully in making the analysis. (Basse and Selve v. Bank of Australasia.) 618
BANKRUPTCY.
Bankruptcy notice—Address of creditor—Power of Court of Bankruptcy to go behind judgment—Form of judgment.—The fact that a judgment may be irregular or wrong in form is not a sufficient reason for the Court in Bankruptcy to exercise its power to go behind the judgment. The judgment is conclusive unless the consideration can be questioned. It is not sufficient for a creditor who issues a bankruptcy notice to give in the notice an address at which he can be heard

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

- Execution—Payment to creditor—Withdrawal by sheriff—Bankruptcy of debtor—Completion of execution—Title of trustee.—On the 22nd July 1903 the sheriff levied on the goods of the debtor at the Alexandra and Adelphi Hotels. On the 27th July he withdrew, on the instructions of the judgment creditor, from the Alexandra Hotel on part payment. On the 28th July the debtor sold to the execution creditor goods at the Alexandra Hotel which had been seized, and on the 29th July he also sold to the execution creditor goods at the same place which had not been seized. On the same day an arrangement was made by which the debtor received credit for the amount in the hands of the sheriff and for the goods sold, and he paid the balance direct to the execution creditor. The sheriff withdrew, and on the 12th Aug. he paid over the amount in his hands to the execution creditor, having received no notice of a bankruptcy petition. On the 20th Aug. a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition. Held, that the trustee in bankruptcy had no title against the execution creditor to the money or the goods. (Re Jenkins; Ex parte The Trustee.) ... 65
- Final judgment in High Court—Judgment summons in County Court—Bankruptcy notice—Order on judgment summons to pay by instalments—No default—Petition.—A judgment summons was issued in the County Court on a final judgment in the High Court, and on the 17th Oct. 1903 a bankruptcy notice was served, which was not complied with. On the 2nd Nov. an order to pay by instalments was made on the judgment summons. On the 3rd Nov. a bankruptcy petition was presented by another creditor, founded on the non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice. Held, that the petitioning creditor was entitled to a receiving order, the debtor having committed an act of bankruptcy before the making of the order on the judgment summons, which any creditor could take advantage of. (Re A Debtor, No. 112 of 1903; Ex parte Rock Red Brick Company.) ... 64
- Marriage settlement—Husband's covenant to settle all after-acquired property except business assets—Act of bankruptcy—Subsequent transfer of property to the trustees of the settlement—Title of trustee in bankruptcy—Meaning of "becoming bankrupt."—By his marriage settlement, executed in 1879, the debtor covenanted to settle all after-acquired property, both real and personal, except business assets. In 1891 he was very successful, and purchased a house and furniture for 17,000*l.*, in which he lived with his wife and family. Early in 1903 he was in financial difficulties, and on the 23rd May the trustees of the settlement served a written notice requiring him to transfer the house and furniture. On the 26th May the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy, and on the 10th June he conveyed the house and furniture to the trustees by two deeds. On the 15th July the receiving order was made on an act of bankruptcy committed after the 10th June, and on the 23rd July the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. Held, that the words "becoming bankrupt" in sect. 47 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 must be construed by the light of sect. 43 of that Act, and mean the commission of an act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order is made, or, if more than one act of bankruptcy has been committed, the first act of bankruptcy proved to have been committed within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, and that, as the house and furniture had not been actually transferred to the trustees of the marriage settlement before the 26th May, the transfer on the 10th June was void against the trustee in bankruptcy. (Re Reis; Ex parte The Trustee.) ... 62
- Proof—Gambling debt—Bills in consideration of withdrawing letters to clubs complaining of non-payment.—M. had acted as B.'s agent in the making of bets. M. sued B. to recover money paid for B. in respect of bets, and B. successfully pleaded the Gaming Act 1892. M. wrote to B.'s clubs complaining of B.'s conduct, and thereupon an arrangement was made by which, in consideration of M. withdrawing the letters of complaint, B. gave him bills for the amount due. Before all the bills were met B. became bankrupt. Held, that the bills were not given in consideration of the gambling debts, but on the consideration of withdrawing the letters to B.'s clubs, which was not an illegal consideration, and that M. could prove on the bills in B.'s bankruptcy. (Re Browne; Ex parte Martingell.) ... 291
- Proof—Withdrawal before admission—Substitution of fresh proof—Voluntary payment to creditor by stranger—Right of proof for whole debt.—If the trustee has neither admitted a proof nor given any intimation of an intention to do so, the creditor is entitled to withdraw his proof and present a fresh proof without leave; and it makes no difference that the twenty-eight days limited by rule 228, within which the trustee is required either to admit or reject the proof, has elapsed. A creditor who has received from a stranger a voluntary payment, not tendered or accepted as part of the debt due from the debtor, is not bound to give credit for such payment in his proof. (Re Rowe; Ex parte Derenburg.) ... 290
- Right to annul adjudication—Debtor presenting his own petition—Endeavour to avoid committal order—Abuse of process of court—Property vesting in trustee—Personal earnings of debtor—Weekly wages—Commission.—The weekly wages and commission earned by a bankrupt between the commencement of his bankruptcy and his discharge are personal earnings of the bankrupt and belong to his trustee, except so much as is necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family. A debtor, with the intention of evading a committal order made against him upon a judgment summons, presented his own bankruptcy petition, upon which a receiving order was made. His income was about 300*l.* a year from weekly wages and commission, and the judgment creditor was his only creditor, the debt amounting to about 200*l.*, being the balance of a judgment obtained against him. Held, that the presentation of the petition by the debtor was not an abuse of the process of the court. (Re Hancock; Ex parte Hilleary.) ... 389
- Settlement—Settlor's own property—Trust to pay income to settlor determinable on bankruptcy—Discretionary power of trustees to apply income for benefit of settlor, or his children, or to accumulate—Second bankruptcy—Debtor unmarried—Right of trustee to income of settled funds.—In 1893 the debtor assigned property to trustees on trust to pay him the income until he was declared bankrupt. Thereafter his rights were to cease, and a discretionary power was given to his trustees to apply the income of any part thereof to the maintenance of the debtor, or for the benefit of his children, or to accumulate. In 1900 the settlor was adjudicated bankrupt, and under sect. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 an order was made setting aside the settlement so far as necessary to pay the provable debts. The trustees raised sufficient to pay in full the debts and costs, but the bankruptcy was not annulled. In 1902 the debtor was again adjudicated bankrupt. The trustee in this bankruptcy failed to obtain an order under sect. 47, the judge finding as a fact that at the time of making the settlement the debtor was able to pay all his debts without the property comprised in it. The trustee then applied for a declaration that the life estate of the bankrupt vested in him. The debtor was unmarried. Held, that the debtor's life interest became forfeited on the first bankruptcy, when the income became vested under the control and discretion of the trustees, and it could only be divested by impeaching the settlement. By sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, if "none of the proposals respecting licences in the district is carried by the prescribed majority . . . the number of licences shall continue as they are until the next licensing poll." A "licensing poll" was taken in the N. district, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, but was afterwards declared void on the ground of certain irregularities. The appellant, who was the holder of a licence in the district, afterwards applied to the licensing committee for a renewal of his licence. No objection was made to the renewal, but the committee held that, under the circumstances, they had no power to renew any licence. Held, that the contingency of the poll taken being legally null and void was covered by sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, and that all existing licences continued in force until the next licensing poll. Newfoundland, law of—Occupation of land—Right of occupier as against wrongdoer—License to cut timber—Effect of.—The effect of a licence to cut timber on Crown land under cap. 13, s. 51, of the Consolidated Statutes of Newfoundland (second series) is to confer a title to the land and an exclusive right of occupation in the licensee, subject to the reservations contained in the Act; and therefore such licensee has lawful possession of timber lying on the land which was cut by a trespasser before the date of the licence, and is entitled to damages for its removal. Held, that this was a final judgment that the sum of money represented by the alleged note was not due, and, notice of appeal not having been given within the time limited by the Yukon Territory Act 1899, no appeal lay to the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and consequently a further appeal from that court to the Supreme Court of Canada was incompetent. New South Wales, law of—Public Works Act—Land taken for public purposes—Valuation—Costs.—By the Public Works Act of New South Wales (1900, No. 26) land for authorised works may be taken by the Government, and persons claiming compensation are to serve a notice of the particulars of their interest in the land, and of their claims for damages. The Minister for Public Works is then required to cause a valuation to be made, and to give notice to the claimant of the amount of such valuation. If the Minister and the claimant do not agree as to the valuation, the claimant may bring an action to recover the amount of compensation claimed by him. If the verdict is for a sum equal to or less than the amount of the notified valuation, the claimant is to pay the costs; but if for a greater sum, the costs are to be paid by the Minister. In a case in which land belonging to the respondents was taken under the Act, and the Minister gave them notice of a valuation, and afterwards, at the respondents' request, reconsidered the valuation, and wrote a letter to the respondents' agent to the effect that he was prepared to pay a sum larger than the original valuation, but gave no formal notice of the increased sum under the Act, and the respondents declined the increased offer: Held, that the letter was a sufficient amendment of the previous formal notification, and as in the subsequent proceedings the respondents only obtained a verdict for a sum equal to the amended offer made in the letter, they were not entitled to costs. "wharfage and tonnage rates according to the provisions of the Wharfage and Tonnage Act 1884." The Act of 1884 did not apply to private wharves. Held, that the rates granted by the later Act were to be levied on goods landed at a wharf vested in the commissioners though it was in the occupation of a private person. Held, further, that the fact that the lessee of a wharf who remained in occupation of the wharf after the expiration of his lease, and had applied for a renewal of the lease, and had paid rent in advance pending such renewal, had not "an interest in such lands" within sect. 27 of the Act. 		Alteration of regulations—Assurance company constituted by deed of settlement—Policy participating in profits—Registration under Companies Acts—Power of company to alter rights of policyholder.—An insurance company was constituted in 1854 by a deed of settlement providing that the profits were to be divided in manner directed by the by-laws, and that any provisions of the deed and any by-law might be altered by a by-law. In 1854 by-laws were made which provided that profits arising from the participating branch should be divided among the policy-holders in that department. In 1886 the plaintiff effected a policy on his own life in the participating branch, relying on the statement in a prospectus of the company that the entire profits in the mutual department were divided among the policy-holders without any deduction for a reserve fund; and he paid a higher premium in consequence under a table given in the prospectus which was to assure a sum payable at death, "with profits in addition." The policy contained a covenant by the company to pay the sum assured "and all such other sums (if any) as the company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being." Profits were not otherwise expressly mentioned. The company was afterwards registered under sect. 209 of the Companies Act 1862, and it was now proposed under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 to substitute a memorandum and articles of association for the deed of settlement, by which the directors would be empowered to appropriate 5 per cent. of all the profits (including those arising from the mutual department) to form a reserve fund. Held, that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the company which the company could not alter either by a by-law, special resolution, or articles of association; that the word "practice" in the policy could not have so wide a meaning as to justify an alteration of the rights of, or the diversion of any part of the profits from, the participating policy-holders. The rights of a shareholder in respect of his shares, except so far as they may be protected by the memorandum of association, are by statute made liable to alteration by special resolution, but the case of a contract between an outsider and the company is entirely different, and even a shareholder must be regarded as an outsider in so far as he contracts with the company otherwise than in respect of his shares. Debenture trust deed—Payment of interest and principal—Default—Realisation of securities—Appropriation by payees to principal and interest—Income tax. —The trustees of a debenture deed were directed, in case of default by the J. C. M. Trust Company, to pay the principal moneys and interest for which it should become liable under its debentures, to realise the securities, and apply the proceeds to payment, first, of all arrears of interest on the debentures, and, secondly, in or towards payment of principal. The J. C. M. Trust Company having made default, an order was made in a debenture-holder's action for the trusts of the debenture deed to be carried into execution. Under numerous orders made in the action sums were paid to the debenture-holders on account both of interest, less income tax, and of principal and interest generally. The realisation had now been practically completed, and it was proposed to pay a final dividend to the debenture-holders. It was admitted that if the whole of the past payments which had been made on account generally and any further sums available were attributed solely to principal, they would be insufficient to discharge the whole amount thereof. The Inland Revenue authorities claimed income tax on all payments made generally on account of principal and interest. Held, that all payments hitherto made by the trustees on account generally might be attributed, at the option of the payees as between themselves and the trustees at their election, as payments on account of principal or interest, without prejudice to any question whether or not such payments should be treated in the hands of the payees as principal or interest; and that income		Gas company—Standard rate of dividend fixed by statute—Payment of dividend free of income tax. —Sect. 16 of the Ashton Gas Act 1877 provides that the profits of the Ashton Gas Company to be divided among the shareholders in any one year shall not exceed the rate of 10 per cent. per annum (defined in the Act as the standard rate of dividend) on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorised by Parliament and paid up. Sect. 17 of the same Act provided that a standard price is to be charged by the company for gas, and that the company may increase or diminish the standard dividend in a certain ratio, to be determined by reference to the price charged by them for gas. The company for many years paid dividends exceeding the standard rate of dividend to their shareholders, diminishing the standard price of gas and increasing proportionally the standard rate of dividend. The company distributed all such dividends to their shareholders free of income tax. Held, that by paying the maximum rate of dividend free of income tax the company were in effect paying a higher rate of interest than was authorised by sects. 16 and 17 of the Ashton Gas Act. The prospectus contained certain untrue statements, and also omitted to specify the dates and names of the parties to a certain contract that had been entered into by or on behalf of the company. Held, as regards the untrue statements, that, even though they constituted material misrepresentations and remained untrue to the date of notice of allotment, yet, the defendants having reasonable ground to believe that the statements were true, the plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation from the defendants under sect. 3 of the Directors' Liability Act 1890; and, as regards the omission to specify the dates and names of the parties to the contracts, that, the contracts being material to be known, the prospectus was to be

He then claimed to retain the debt out of the purchase money, and applied for liberty to amend the proof by stating the security and the estimated value of it, or, in the alternative, to withdraw the proof and rely on the security for payment. It appeared that the proof was made out by a clerk who was unaware of the existence of the lien, and that the solicitor, being told by the clerk that the proof was in order, signed and swore it, the statement in it that he held no security for the debt having escaped his attention. Held, that under the circumstances leave ought not to be given to amend or withdraw the proof, as, even if "inadvertence" was proved, in the interval between the carrying in of the proof and the application for leave to amend, the position of all parties, and of the liquidator in particular, had been altered. Registration of transfer of shares—Unreasonable delay—Reconstruction of company—Date on which transfer to be treated as registered.—The court has power under sect. 35 of the Companies Act 1862 to rectify the register of members after the liquidation of the company has commenced; and such power is not limited by sect. 98 to rectification for the purpose of settling the list of contributories. Where there had been unnecessary delay in registering a transfer of shares, and in consequence it had not been registered when the company went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of reconstruction under sect. 161 of the Companies Act 1862, the court, on the application of the transferee, ordered the transfer to be registered as of a date prior to the winding-up, which rendered valid a notice of dissent given by the transferee under sect. 161 after the date on which the transfer ought to have been, but was not, registered. The shares were thereupon forfeited, and sold by the respondents to the appellant company, and by the certificate it was stated that they were 5s. shares on which 3s. 4d. was paid up, and the remaining 1s. 8d. had been called up and was payable by the former holder. It was further stated that the purchasers were "to be deemed to be holders of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof." Transfer—Address of transferor not appearing—Number of share not stated—Refusal of company to register.—Where by a clause of the articles of association of a company every member may transfer all or any of his shares, but every transfer must be in writing and in the usual common form, the fact that the deed of transfer of a member of the company who is selling his only share does not set out the address of the transferor or the number of the share is not sufficient ground for the company to refuse to register the transfer on the ground of irregularity. The freeholder then agreed to give the leaseholder a new lease, and subsequently received compensation from the railway company in settlement of all claims under the notice to treat, except claims for damage by subsidence. The freeholder then sold the freehold to the leaseholder. During the new lease and after the acquisition of the freehold, structural damage was caused to the premises and to the stock and the trade. Held, that the original leaseholder was only entitled to compensation in respect of such damage, if any, as occurred under the original lease in respect of which the notice to treat was served. The acceptance by the sub-lessee of a new sub-lease and the implied surrender of the original one after the notice to treat has been served in respect of the interest in the original sub-lease, the damage having been done during the continuance of the original sub-lease, does not preclude the sub-lessee from recovering compensation. A claim for compensation under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act 1845 is in the nature of a claim for damages for a wrong, and as such is not a legal chose in action within sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1875 so that the assignee can sue in her own name. Right to supply refreshments in a theatre—Use of cellars—Right to let spaces for advertisements—Licence—"Interest in land."—The lessees of a theatre by a written agreement granted to a refreshment contractor at a fixed weekly rental, for the term of the lease of the theatre, the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments there, with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms, bars, cloakrooms, and cellars of the theatre, together with the right, during the usual hours, of free access thereto as might be necessary and usual and proper for the purpose of exercising the rights thus granted, and also the sole and exclusive privilege during the term of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in the refreshment and cloak rooms. Held, that the agreement did not create any "interest in land" within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, so as to entitle the refreshment contractor to compensation on the theatre being taken over under the Act.
Petition—Taxation—Copies of evidence—Costs of contributories successfully opposing.—Upon a winding-up petition, where charges of fraud were brought against director contributories, the common order as to costs was made in dismissing the petition. The contributories who had successfully opposed claimed that they were entitled to recover from the petitioner the costs of taking copies of the evidence filed by him, and objected to the registrar's disallowance of them. Scotch contract of marriage—Husband domiciled in England—Wife domiciled in Scotland—Trustees subject to English courts—Settlement of wife's property—Real estate in Scotland—Life interest of husband—Alimentary clause—Provision against alienation—Charges created—Validity.—A contract executed in Scotland in Scotch form on the marriage in Scotland of a domiciled Englishman with a domiciled Scotchwoman, whereby certain Scotch heritable bonds, the property of the wife—which according to the law of Scotland are regarded as immovables—were (inter alia) settled, was held to be subject to Scotch law, and the husband was held to be entitled to such interest only thereunder as the courts in Scotland would declare him entitled to, and that he was therefore entitled to the whole income of the settled property during his life free from the claims of any assignees or incumbrancers, but without prejudice to the rights (if any) of his alimentary creditors, and without prejudice to any prior payment in respect of a certain policy of insurance on his life. Implied condition—Contract to pay bonus to customers for four years—Sale of business—Implied contract to continue to carry on business—Breach of contract.—In consideration of a promise by the defendant, a retail tobacconist, not to sign any agreement with any company or firm which would prevent him from buying or selling the goods of the plaintiffs, and to continue to buy and sell the plaintiffs' goods, the plaintiffs agreed that the defendant should for four years share in a distribution by them of an annual bonus among such of their customers as should purchase direct from them, the distribution to be made according to the purchases for the year. In pursuance of the agreement, the defendant bought goods from the plaintiffs; but the plaintiffs, before the expiration of one year, sold their business and went into liquidation. Held, that it was an implied term of the contract that the plaintiffs would not discontinue to carry on business during the term of four years, so as to prevent the defendant from earning his share of the bonus, and that the defendant was entitled to damages for breach of the contract. Impossibility of performance—Money paid by one party—Right to recover back—Money due and payable before contract became impossible—Right to recover.—The defendants agreed to give the plaintiff the use of a room to view the intended Coronation procession on the 26th June 1902 for the sum of 141 l. , which was payable upon the making of the contract, and on the 20th June the plaintiff paid 100 l. on account. The intended procession being subsequently abandoned, the plaintiff claimed repayment of the 100 l. as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, and the defendants claimed payment of the balance of 41 l. Held, that the defendants were entitled to recover the unpaid balance which was payable before the procession was abandoned. Performance rendered impossible—No default by either party—Money payable before performance became impossible—Right to recover—Construction of contract—Cheque given, but payment stopped.—It was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the plaintiff should provide the refreshments for a steamer which the defendants had hired to carry passengers to the naval review which was arranged to take place on the 28th June 1902 in connection with the Coronation of the King. The contract provided that 300 l. should be paid to the plaintiff on account of the refreshments on the 23rd June; and the defendants stipulated that "in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the contractor there shall be no liability on our side." On the 23rd June the defendants sent a cheque for 300 l. to the plaintiff. On the 24th June the review was cancelled owing to the illness of the King, and the defendants stopped payment of the cheque. The plaintiff had incurred only a small amount of expense. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of the cheque. Held, that the true construction of the contract was that, in the event of the review being cancelled, the defendants were to be liable only for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the sum of 300 l. (Elliott v. Crutchley and another.)	497.

Fine—Colourable admittance—Customary tenant—Right of lord to have admittance cancelled.—By the custom of the manor of R. a person not already a customary tenant taking any estate as a purchaser by surrender or otherwise has to pay an arbitrary fine to the lord, but a customary tenant purchasing other customary lands pays only two years' quit rent of the purchase. S., who was not a customary tenant, having agreed to purchase certain property within the manor, agreed with L. to purchase of him a cottage within the manor for 100 l. , S. agreeing to pay all expenses in connection with the transfer, to reconvey the cottage within three months for 75 l. , and to allow L. to collect and retain the rent of such cottage, L. to pay all outgoings. If S. desired to retain the cottage he was to pay 80 l. more. S. was duly admitted to the cottage, and paid an arbitrary fine in respect thereof to the lord. He then applied and was admitted to the certain other property, paying a sum of 6 d. as quit rent only. Held, that, as the transaction with regard to the cottage was a colourable one (though not fraudulent), the lord of the manor was entitled to an arbitrary fine in respect of the property as if S. had not been admitted to the cottage. Dumbell and another.)	315
Reference to master under Order XIV.—High Court scale.—Where an action is brought in the High Court and an application is made under Order XIV., and the action is referred to a master under rule 7 of that order, if the plaintiff recovers more than 20 l. , but less than 50 l. , he can only recover County Court costs of action, but, so far as the costs of the reference are concerned, the master is to be deemed an arbitrator, and he has the same discretion as to costs, including the power to certify for High Court costs of the reference, as an arbitrator has. A master has no power to extend the twenty-one days allowed for obtaining judgment under Order XIV. with High Court costs, as by sect. 116 of the County Courts Act 1888 that power is only given to a judge of the High Court. (Haycocks Limited v. Mulholland.)	88	Cross-judgments—Separate actions—Payment of judgment debt into court—Right to set off smaller judgment debt—Solicitor's lien for costs—Right to enforce lien against whole sum in court.—By sect. 150 of the County Courts Act 1888 it is provided: "If there shall be cross-judgments between the parties, execution shall be taken out by that party only who shall have obtained judgment for the larger sum, and for so much only as shall remain after deducting the smaller sum, and satisfaction for the remainder shall be entered, as well as satisfaction on the judgment for the smaller sum; and if both sums shall be equal, satisfaction shall be entered upon both judgments." Held, that this section applies where cross-judgments are obtained by the parties in separate actions, and not merely where the cross-judgments are obtained in a claim and counter-claim in the same action; and also where the party against whom judgment has been obtained for the larger sum has paid that sum into court without waiting for execution to be taken out, but the party against whom judgment has been obtained for the smaller sum has not paid that sum into court; and that before the party in whose favour the larger sum has been paid into court can have that sum paid out to him, the other party is entitled to have deducted from it the smaller sum for which he has obtained judgment, although that sum has not been paid into court, notwithstanding that the solicitor of the party in whose favour the judgment for the larger sum has been obtained has a lien for his costs upon the whole sum in court, as in such case the solicitor's lien for his costs extends not to the whole sum in court, but to the balance only. (Ward v. Haddrill.)	232
Taxation—Costs after threat of proceedings.—A letter threatening an action was written by the plaintiff's solicitors on the 3rd March 1903. The defendant on the 20th March 1903 obtained a transcript of the speeches, evidence, and judgment of actions against other defendants in which the fraud, to which it was alleged the defendant was a party, was disclosed. The writ was issued on the 16th April 1903. The action was dismissed for want of prosecution. The taxing master had allowed the costs of the transcript. Held, that the matter must be referred back to the master, with a direction to allow only the costs of so much of the transcript of the evidence and judgment as related to the question whether the defendant was or was not party or privy to the fraud disclosed in the former actions. (Bright's Trustee v. Sellar.)	155	Jurisdiction—Specific performance—Sale of equity of redemption—Purchase money less than 500 l. —Value of property exceeding 500 l. —Sect. 67, subsect. 4, of the County Courts Act 1888 gives the County Court jurisdiction in actions for specific performance of any agreement for the sale or purchase of any property where the purchase money does not exceed 500 l. Held, that under this sub-section the County Court has jurisdiction to hear an action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of an equity of redemption in any property where the actual purchase money agreed to be paid for such equity of redemption does not exceed 500 l. , although the property itself may be of a value exceeding 500 l. , or may be subject to a charge exceeding 500 l. , the test of the jurisdiction in such cases being, not the value of the property or the amount of the charge, but the actual amount of the purchase money to be paid. (Rex v. Judge of the Birmingham County Court and another; Ex parte Rogers.)	514
Taxation—Inspection of machinery by arrangement between parties and without order of court.—Discretion of taxing master.—Where for the purposes of an action there has been an inspection of machinery by arrangement between the parties and without an order of the court being obtained thereto, the taxing master is not debarred by Order L., r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court from allowing the costs of such inspection. COUNTY COURT.
Costs—Remitted action—Payment into court under Order XIV. of part of claim as condition of leave to defend—Trial in County Court—Judgment for defendant for balance with costs—Scale of costs applicable.—In an action of contract brought in the High Court for 71 l. an order was made under Order XIV. that on the defendants paying into court 23 l. they should have liberty to defend the action, otherwise judgment for that amount and costs, with liberty to the defendants to defend as to the residue. The defendants paid the 23 l. into court, and the action was remitted to a County Court under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888. After the action was so remitted, and more than five clear days before the day fixed for the hearing, the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice that they were willing to consent to judgment for the 23 l. in court with costs. At the trial the County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants for the residue of the claim, with costs after payment into court, the plaintiffs to have the money in court and costs up to payment in, which were paid by the defendants. Upon taxation of the defendants' costs: Held, (1) that the defen-

- the action it was held that the defendant was affected with notice of the building stipulations, and that the plaintiff had only committed a trivial breach of a trivial covenant, and that such a breach did not disentitle the plaintiff from having the building stipulations strictly enforced, and judgment was given for the plaintiff with costs, the defendant being directed to remove certain buildings erected by him on the land. The third party to the action had sold the property to the defendant, and upon such sale had written a letter agreeing to indemnify the defendant, as purchaser, against all "costs, damages, and expenses" which the defendant might suffer or incur "by reason of the building stipulations and conditions being other than those set out in the copy." Held, that the third party was liable to pay the defendant the difference in the value of the plot in consequence of the amount of land available for building under the provisions of the deed of 1854 being less than under the supposed copy; and also of the defence that the plaintiff was disentitled to sue in consequence of his having broken one of the covenants. Held, also, that the defendant, having had actual notice of the provisions of the deed of 1854 before he commenced to build, the third party was not liable for the cost of building or removing the buildings. Held, also, that the defendant was not entitled to recover from the third party the costs of the plaintiff incurred in the action and paid by the defendant, or the defendant's own costs so far as they related to the following defences set up by the defendant—viz., a denial that the provisions of the deed of 1854 applied to the plot purchased by him or that he had notice of such provisions; that the liquidator of the company formerly owning the land to which the deed of 1854 applied had, under a power given by that deed to the "vendors, their heirs or assigns," by an agreement in writing, approved of by the court, released or waived the covenant which it was alleged had been broken; that no building scheme was contained in the deed of 1854, and if there was it had come to an end by mutual consent of the various purchasers of the land comprised in it. - Sale of medical practice—Covenant not to set up in practice within certain distance—Residence beyond distance—Attending former patients within distance.—Where on the sale of a medical practice the vendor covenants not to "set up in practice" within the distance of two miles from the house at which he carried on the practice sold, he does not commit a breach of that covenant by attending at their request for remuneration two or three of his former patients within that distance, though it is not essential to the breach of such a covenant that the vendor should reside within the prohibited area; he may reside beyond the distance and yet commit a breach of the covenant by acts done within it. CRIMINAL LAW.

- Bankruptcy—Fraudulent debtor—Absconding with property—Debtor's property—Deed of assignment—Revocable deed.—Property of an assignor does not become the property of the trustee under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors until it has come into the possession of the trustee. J. H. executed a deed of assignment whereby he assigned all his property to W. B. as trustee for his creditors. The deed was duly registered as a deed of assignment, but was not disclosed to the creditors. Immediately after the execution of the deed J. H., having, without the knowledge of the trustee, collected certain debts due to him, absconded with part of the proceeds of his collection, and left England. He was thereupon adjudicated a bankrupt, and subsequently indicted, under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869, for having quitted England and taken with him part of his property which should have been divided amongst his creditors. Held, that the money with which J. H. absconded, having never come into the possession of the trustee, was not the property of the trustee, but remained the property of J. H., and that J. H. was therefore properly convicted under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869. (Rex v. Humphris.)... 555

CUSTOM.

- Sale of goods—Right to reject—Custom limiting right—Validity—Custom incorporated in contracts—Powers of trade arbitrators.—By a custom a buyer of barley was not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same was excessive or unreasonable and was so found by arbitration under the contract. Held, that the custom was good. Seemle, that where a custom applicable to contracts in a certain trade comes to be incorporated as an express term in the contracts of that trade, the proper inference to be drawn is that it destroys that custom as a custom. Apart from custom or contract, an arbitrator has no jurisdiction to award a money compensation instead of rejection, where such right to reject exists. (Walkers, Winsor, and Co. v. Shaw, Son, and Co.) ... 454

DAMAGES.

- Measure of—Sale of goods—Disclaimer of responsibility for bad workmanship—Costs of action by sub-vendee against purchaser reasonably defended.—The plaintiffs having undertaken the repairs of a steamship for the owners, employed the defendants, an engineering company, to construct a new crank shaft. The defendants agreed to do so, upon the terms of their not being responsible for failure of material or workmanship beyond the replacement of faulty work supplied by them. In an action by the plaintiffs against the ship-owners to recover the price of the shaft which had been supplied by the defendants, the ship-owners counter-claimed for damages for breach of contract in consequence of the shaft having broken down on a voyage. The plaintiffs, after communicating with the defendants, who thereupon repudiated all responsibility, defended the counter-claim. The shipowners succeeded on their counter-claim, the shaft being found to have been of faulty workmanship. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the costs of the shipowners' counter-claim, as damages resulting from the defendants' breach of contract: Held, that the terms on which the defendants had supplied the shaft did not relieve them from paying these costs; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the costs of the counter-claim except so far as they were increased by any issue other than the faultiness of the material or workmanship of the shaft. DENTISTRY.

- Unregistered person—Supply of false teeth—Fitting set in patient's mouth—Right to recover fee—"Dental operation, dental attendance or advice."—A person who was carrying on the practice of a dentist, but who was not registered under the Dentists Act 1878, made for the defendant and fitted to the defendant's mouth a set of false teeth which were taken by the defendant and kept and used by him. The defendant having refused to pay for the same: Held, that sect. 5 of the Dentists Act 1878, which prevented an unregistered person from recovering any fee or charge for "the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice," did not prevent the unregistered person from recovering the price of the set of teeth so supplied, as distinguished from the fitting of the same. DOMICIL.
Renunciation of domicile of origin—Evidence—Burden of proof.—The onus of proving that a domicile has been chosen in substitution for the domicile of origin lies upon the party asserting that the domicile of origin has been lost. W. , whose domicile of origin was in America, left America in 1850 and resided in Russia, for business purposes, for twenty years, visiting England in the winter to avoid the Russian climate. In 1870 he came to reside in England, but up to 1883 visited Russia yearly for business purposes. From 1883 up to his death in 1897 he resided in England. He retained a large interest in property in America, and always described himself as an American citizen, and spoke frequently of his intention of returning to America to develop his property in that country. While in England he lived in various houses taken on short leases. His will was proved in England, and the Crown claimed legacy duty on his estate, which was very large. Held, Lord Lindley dissenting, that the Crown had failed to discharge the onus, which was upon them, of proving that W. had a fixed and settled purpose of renouncing his domicile of origin, and that the claim for legacy duty failed. EASEMENT.
Ancient lights—Substantial interference—Sufficient light for ordinary purposes.—Where the light which the respondents had enjoyed for more than twenty years had been interfered with by the appellant's building, but not to such an extent as to make it insufficient for ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business: Held, that they were not entitled to relief. The Prescription Act has not in any way altered the pre-existing law in that respect. (Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores Limited.) 687
Light—Implied reservation on grant by common owner—Easement of necessity—Easement necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of property.—By conveyance dated in 1895 the premises (subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff) were conveyed by the defendant, who retained a messuage also belonging to him at that time immediately adjoining. A portion of the retained premises (containing one window on the ground floor and one window on the first floor) overlooked a yard forming part of the hereditaments conveyed in 1895. By that conveyance the plaintiff's predecessor in title covenanted with the defendant to permit him at all times to enter upon the land thereby conveyed to point or otherwise repair the buildings erected on his retained adjoining land, but defendant expressly reserved no right of light to his windows. Plaintiff erected a wall in her yard to obstruct the defendant's windows, and the defendant knocked it down, for the purpose of asserting an easement of necessity in respect of the light to his two windows, alleging that there was no other means by which natural light could enter them, and that the access of light through them was absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of his room and landing in which they were placed. Held, that the defendant had not shown that he was entitled by right to an easement of necessity in respect of the light to his windows, but claimed only an easement which was necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of his property, which latter right not having been expressly reserved in the conveyance of 1895, the plaintiff was entitled to build so as to obstruct the light to the two windows, but so as not to trespass on defendant's wall or to infringe the covenant by plaintiff's predecessor in title in the conveyance to him as to pointing or otherwise repairing the buildings on defendant's adjoining land. (Ray v. Hazeldine.) 703
Ornamental garden—Rights thereto of occupiers of adjoining houses—User by their families and friends—Proprietary club owned by limited liability company—Resident and non-resident members.—By a deed rights of user of an ornamental garden were granted to C. H. B., his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and his or their lessees or sublessees or tenants (being occupiers for the time being) of houses immediately contiguous or adjoining to the ornamental inclosure, and for his or their families or friends in his or their company or without. A limited company, having purchased certain of the houses from C. H. B. and started a social and residential club for lady workers, authorised and allowed its members to use the garden. Held, that, as the relation of the members to the club was that of customers, and not sublessees, tenants, or friends, upon the true construction of the deed, the company could not authorise such user. (Keith v. Twentieth Century Club Limited.) 775
Prescription—Right of way—Forty years' enjoyment—Two tenements held under same owner—Prescription by one tenant against another tenant of same owner.—A tenant cannot, by enjoyment for a period of forty years, acquire a prescriptive right to an easement, such as a right of way, under sect. 2 of the Prescription Act 1832, as against another tenant of the same landlord. (Kilgour v. Gaddes.) 604
Right of way—Abandonment—Non-user—Excessive user.—In 1891 certain premises were conveyed to M., together with a right of way over land coloured yellow on the plan on the deed. The land coloured yellow was subsequently conveyed to J., who covenanted to permit the use of the right of way. M. owned other adjoining premises, and erected assembly rooms partly on the land to which there was a right of way and partly on the adjoining premises. The licensing magistrates objected to a gateway opening on the right of way, but in 1892 a wall was built with an opening for a gateway 6ft. 9in. wide, this opening being temporarily closed with sliding scaffold boards. In 1894 the hereditaments formerly belonging to M. were sold to F., together with the right of way, and in December of that year the scaffold boards were removed to enable building material to be taken along the right of way. In 1896 a further application to the magistrates to allow gates to be placed at the gateway was refused, and the magistrates insisted on the gateway being bricked up. In 1898 the premises, together with the right of way, were conveyed to G. M. In 1903 an opening was made in the wall and a gate 4ft. 4in. wide placed there, and materials for altering the premises were conveyed along the right of way. The only access to the building, at the rear of the assembly rooms, was over the right of way. The present owners of the land coloured yellow claimed that the right of way had been abandoned, or, if not, as it was used to buildings not wholly erected on the dominant tenement, that the user was excessive. They brought an action against G. M. and his mortgagees, claiming to restrain the use of the right of way. Held, (1) that there had been no abandonment of the right of way; (2) that the user was bona fide , although a portion of the building extended beyond the boundary of the land entitled to the right of way; and (3) that the mortgagees were not necessary or proper parties to the action. The corporation of J. and the county council of D. are respectively the local education authorities for the borough of J. and the rural district of M. At the passing of the Education Act 1902 the H., M., and J. United District School Board was the school board for the urban district of H., the rural district of M., and the borough of J. The 1st April 1904 was the appointed day for the coming into operation of that Act within the county of D. and the borough of J. Matters having arisen requiring adjustment between the council and the united district school board, and clause 1 of the second schedule to the Act providing that the rights and liabilities "of any school board" existing at the appointed day should be transferred to the council exercising the powers of the school board: Held, that an arbitrator should be at once appointed to adjust such matters, and that the appointment should not be delayed until the appointed day for the remainder of the united district school board. The following is a copy of the warranty in question: 'We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure; guaranteed pure butter within the 3rd and 7th sects. of the Margarine Act 1877.' ... The defendant intends to rely on the foregoing as a defence to this summons." On the 4th Aug. the appellant had purchased the butter of the wholesale house, and on the invoice was stated: "We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure." The appellant was dissatisfied with this, and, when going to the wholesale house the following week, and after the butter was delivered, took the invoice to the wholesale house, who put on it: "Guaranteed pure butter in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1887. In case of samples being taken for analysis, show this warranty to the inspector." There is no common law right to bathe. It is not to be inferred that the owner of the foreshore has dedicated it to the public from the mere fact that he does not object to people who do no damage wandering at will over the sand from time to time uncovered by the sea. The quantity of timber so hauled was about 1500 tons, and the felling and hauling were done under several separate contracts extending over the two years. During this period the traffic of the defendants over the roads was unusual traffic, did unusual damage to the roads, and caused unusual expenses in repairing the roads, which were constructed to bear ordinary country traffic, usually agricultural traffic. In an action brought by the highway authority to recover the expenses of repairing the roads, as being "extraordinary expenses" incurred by them in consequence of the "extraordinary traffic" within sect. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act 1878, the defendants alleged that the timber was the natural produce of the land and that the carting of such produce to the railway station was ordinary traffic and an ordinary user of the road. Held, that, having regard to the total weight carried, the frequency of the loads and the means by which it was carried, the traffic was "extraordinary traffic" within the meaning of sect. 23, and the fact that the timber was the natural produce of the land did not, under the circumstances, prevent the traffic from being "extraordinary," or the expenses from being "extraordinary expenses," which the highway authority were entitled to recover. Held, further, that the work was not a "particular work extending over a long period" within the meaning of sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act 1898, and that therefore the sub-section did not give the highway authority the right to bring their action for the recovery of the whole of the expenses within six months after the completion of the work, and consequently that by the sub-section their claim was barred for any expenses incurred more than twelve months before the commencement of the action. GRANT OF LAND.		WILFUL OBSTRUCTION. —No obstruction in fact—Truck in street for purpose of cleaning house—Purpose, time, and space reasonable.—A truck, 6ft. long by 2ft. 8in. wide, containing an apparatus for removing dust from houses, was placed by D. in a highway 30ft. wide for some hours, while the dust was being removed from a certain house. There was no evidence that anyone was incommoded or that anyone was prevented from passing along the highway. It was found as a fact that the business, purpose, and time selected were reasonable, and that neither the time nor the space occupied were excessive, but that the system of cleaning was not necessary to the ordinary comfort or exigency of life, and was still in the experimental stage, and that the noise of the apparatus and the collection of sight-seers might cause discomfort or inconvenience to the occupiers of houses and people using the street. Held, that there was no evidence of wilful obstruction within sect. 54 (6) of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839. (Dunn, app. v. Holt, resp.)	577 Reservation to grant—Omission from subsequent grant—Effect.—In 1829 the Crown granted land adjoining the sea to a corporation, reserving (inter alia) "all such part of the said piece or parcel of land hereinbefore described as may be within 100ft. of high-water mark on the sea coast, or in any creek, harbour, or inlet." In 1830 the corporation, in execution of a previous contract, sold the land to D., through whom the respondents claimed, and D. executed a mortgage to the corporation to secure part of the purchase money, which was then unpaid. The land was conveyed to D. "to hold the same subject to the reservation and conditions in the now recited grant" (meaning the grant of 1829 from the Crown) "contained." In 1833 the corporation was dissolved by Order in Council, and its property thereupon reverted to the Crown, "subject to all mortgages and contracts for sale previously lawfully made." In 1840 D. paid off the mortgage, and the Crown granted the land to him. This grant made no mention of the reservation above mentioned, and described the land as being bounded on one side "by the water of" the "harbour." Held, that the effect of the grant of 1840 was to do away with the reservation contained in the earlier grant. (Attorney-General for New South Wales v. HIGHWAY.
Local authority—Road not safe for traffic—Misfeasance—Liability.—The appellants, who were both the sanitary and the highway authority, dug a trench along a road under their control for the purpose of laying a sewer. When the work was completed they filled in the trench and opened the road for traffic. About a week afterwards the respondent was driving along the road in a cab at night. The driver found that the part of the road where the trench had been opened was soft, and crossed on to the other side, and ran into a heap of rubbish, with the result that the cab was overturned and the respondent was injured. The rubbish had been wrongfully deposited in the road without the permission of the appellants, but they knew that it was there, and had not lighted or fenced it. The jury found that the part of the road where the trench had been opened had been properly filled in, but had been rendered soft by subsequent rain, and was dangerous to traffic at the time of the accident. Repair — Extraordinary traffic — Extraordinary expenses for repairs—Haulage of timber over roads—Timber the natural produce of land—Period of limitation for recovery of expenses—"Particular work extending over long period."—The defendants for a period extending over two years bought from the owner of an estate a large quantity of timber which was felled on the estate, and the timber was hauled by the defendants to the railway station over two roads for a distance of between two and three miles on each road, the her. During the hearing of the summons the wife gave an undertaking not to remove the child out of the jurisdiction of the court. On the 10th March 1903 the summons was dismissed and the wife was ordered to pay the costs out of her separate property, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation, and she was also ordered to deliver the child to the husband forthwith. It was then discovered that she had sent the child out of the jurisdiction two or three days before the 10th March, and had since gone abroad herself, and she had remained abroad with the child ever since. On the 12th March an order was made for her committal for contempt of court, and directing a writ of attachment should issue against her. The wife gave notice of appeal from so much of the order of the 10th March as directed the costs to be paid out of her separate estate, and it was contended that the court had no jurisdiction to make it. Held, that the rule that a person who is in contempt cannot be heard, prima facie applies to voluntary applications on his part, to cases where he is asking for something, and not to cases in which all he seeks is to be heard in matters of defence; that the appellant objected to the order on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it; and its legality ought to be determined, and therefore the appeal must be heard. Held also, that the summons was not a "proceeding instituted" by the married woman within sect. 2 of the Married Woman's Property Act 1893, but an application in the divorce suit, and there was no jurisdiction to order her to pay the costs out of her separate estate which was subject to a restraint on anticipation. The question having arisen whether, although the wife was no longer in fact "the cohabiting wife" of the husband, the trust in her favour was still subsisting, on the ground that the settlor had attempted to fetter her interest in a manner which was contrary to public policy: Held, that the gift of the life interest to the wife was by way of limitation, and was not a gift defeasible on the performance or non-performance of a condition, and that being so long as she cohabited with her husband, it was a gift rather in favour of morality than against it, and upon the proper construction of the settlements it must be held good. Per Kekewich, J.: "Policy of the law" ought not to be impressed into the service of highly improbable contingencies. (Re Hope-Johnstone's Trusts; Hope-Johnstone v. Hope-Johnstone.) ... 253

Divorce—Wife's petition—Decree nisi—Adultery of petitioner—Discretion of court.—The court has full discretion as to granting a decree nisi in favour of a petitioner, who has been found guilty of adultery, under sect. 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), where the misconduct of the petitioner is more or less pardonable or can be excused, but in order that it may exercise this discretion the misconduct of the petitioner must have been caused by the misconduct or the offences of the respondent. (Wyke v. Wyke, The King's Proctor showing cause.) ... 172	Presumption in favour of a valid marriage—Long-continued open cohabitation—Ceremony—Foreign marriage—Recognition—Strict proof.—Where there is clear proof that English persons intended to be married to one another, some evidence of a ceremony by way of a French marriage de facto , and of recognition of them afterwards as man and wife by their families and by them of their children as legitimate, during a long course of years, the court will not require strict proof of the marriage, even upon the assumption that to contract marriage in France in the manner alleged was not in accordance with the habits of law-abiding people there. The offspring of such a union held therefore entitled to share in a gift under a will to "children." (Re Shephard; George v. Thyer.) ... 249
Marriage settlement—Covenant to settle wife's after-acquired property—Annuities—Construction of covenant.—By her marriage settlement, dated in 1886, a wife covenanted to settle all her after-acquired property, real and personal, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise (with certain small exceptions), upon trust to be sold and converted and held by the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement. During the coverture the wife became entitled to certain annuities. Held, that the annuities were not caught by the covenant. (Re Dowding; Gregory v. Dowding.) ... 82	Separation — Desertion — Condonation — Second separation.—Where an offence has been committed which prima facie entitles a married woman to an order under sect. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, and the offence has been condoned by the wife, the effect of such condonation depends upon the common law and not upon any section of that Act. A married woman issued a summons against her husband complaining of his desertion. The hearing of the summons was adjourned by the justices before whom it came, and before the resumed hearing the wife resumed cohabitation with her husband. She subsequently left him—this also before the resumed hearing—and the justices at the hearing granted her an order for separation and an allowance for maintenance. Held, the order must be discharged since the wife had put an end to the original cause of complaint by the resumption of cohabitation, and that the justices had nothing to adjudicate upon at the date of the adjourned hearing when the order was made. (Williams v. Williams.) ... 174
Policy of the law—Post-nuptial settlements by husband—Trusts for his wife "so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife or the widow" of husband—Condition—Limitation.—By post-nuptial settlements, which did not purport to be agreements between husband and wife, in consideration of natural love and affection, the husband assigned leaseholds to trustees upon trusts during the natural life of the wife or so long as she should continue the cohabiting wife or the widow of the husband, to pay the income to the wife for her separate use, and from the decease of the wife in the lifetime of the husband, or from and after the dissolution of the marriage or judicial separation between them, a protected life interest in the annual proceeds was given to the husband, with a provision for the maintenance of their children. The deed contained an ultimate trust of the corpus of the trust premises in default of children in favour of the next of kin of the husband. There was also a power of advancement during the joint lives and the subsistence of the marriage with the joint consent of the husband and wife and, after her decease or after the dissolution of their marriage or a judicial separation between them, with the consent of the husband. The wife	Separation deed—Construction—Voluntary settlement or deed of separation—Reconciliation—Trust for children.—Where articles of agreement under seal are entered into between husband, wife, and a trustee, reciting that the husband, who was entitled to a share of residue under a will, as a condition of a mutual separation which had been agreed on, had agreed to assign his interest under the will to the trustee upon trust to pay the interest thereof to the wife and then as to the principal for the three children of the marriage, and the wife covenants not to molest the husband, and are followed by a separation and nine months afterwards by reconciliation and return to cohabitation: Held, that, upon the true construction of the articles, the trusts thereby declared in favour of the wife and children were subsisting notwithstanding the reconciliation, and that there was no resulting trust for the settlor, the husband, of the property comprised therein. Women) Act 1893 has the same meaning as in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85). It does not signify simply cessation of cohabitation, but cessation of cohabitation without reasonable cause. It is the duty of justices before whom a summons under the Act of 1893 is heard to allow the husband to cross-examine his wife as to her conduct, and to admit evidence on his behalf showing that the husband has a reasonable excuse or cause for refusing to live with his wife and so to leave her. If the justices find that the husband had reasonable cause for separating from his wife, there is no desertion under sect. 4 of the Act of 1893, and the wife is not entitled to any order. Application form—Policy—Construction—Warranty not to commit suicide—Insurance for benefit of creditor—Executor suing as trustee for creditor.—An application for a policy of life insurance was expressed to be the basis and part of the contract, and contained the following undertaking by the assured: "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract." The policy was taken out for the benefit of a creditor, and by the policy the defendants agreed to pay, subject to conditions, 4000 l. to the creditor "in consideration of the application for this policy which is hereby made a part of this contract." During the period of one year from the signing of the policy, the assured committed suicide in a fit of temporary insanity. Held, that the undertaking was such that the breach of it rendered the policy void, and that it was not an undertaking the breach of which could only give the insurance company a right to claim against the estate of the assured. (Ellinger and Co. and Schlesinger v. Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York .)	494
Lapse of policy on failure of payment of premium—Subsequent payment—Conditional receipt by insurance company—Neglect of assured to read conditions of receipt—Duty of insurance company—Estoppel.—A policy of life insurance effected with an insurance company was expressed to be conditional upon the payment of the premiums each year within thirty days of their becoming due. The holder of the policy failed to pay a certain premium within thirty days of its becoming due. On his afterwards sending the money to the company they sent back to him a receipt upon a printed form, which stated that the policy had lapsed and that the payment was accepted subject to certain conditions printed on the back of the receipt. He received this receipt, but did not read it. One of these conditions was that the person whose life was insured had been during the past twelve months in continuous good health and free from all disease; and he was in fact, and to his knowledge, suffering at that time from a disease of which he afterwards died. Until he died the subsequent premiums were punctually paid. On his death the company refused to pay the sum for which his life had been insured on the ground that the policy had lapsed, and the conditions of the receipt above mentioned had not been complied with. In an action to recover the amount of the insurance money: Held, that, as the policy had lapsed on account of the breach of its conditions, and the plaintiff had given no evidence of any conduct on the part of the company which would justify him in thinking that the policy had not lapsed, and would estop them from relying on the lapsing of the policy, he was not entitled to succeed in the action. (Handler v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association .)	192
Want of insurable interest—Void policy—Innocent misrepresentations of insurance agent as to validity of policy—Ignorance of assured—Mistake of law—Recovery back of premiums paid by assured.—The plaintiff was induced to insure his mother's life with the defendant insurance company by the representations of the company's agent that the policy would be a valid one. These representations were made by the agent innocently, and without any fraudulent intent. In an action by the plaintiff to recover back from the company the premiums he had paid, alleging that the policy was void for want of insurable interest: Held, that, assuming the policy to be void under the Life Insurance Act 1774, yet the misrepresentation of the agent would be a misrepresentation of law, and, the parties being in pari delicto , the plaintiff could not recover in the action. (Haras v. Pearl Life Assurance Company .)	245

Lloyd's policy—"Subject to average"—No average clause attached—Other policies on zones—Applying policies rateably.—A timber yard, as a whole, was insured by a Lloyd's policy for 11,450 l. and in three zones by various fire insurance companies for 25,500 l. On zone B there was only one company's policy for 3000 l. The value in the three zones was 36,500 l. —viz., 1940 l. in zone A, 13,260 l. in B, and 21,300 l. in C; and 12,850 l. —viz., 1900 l. in zone A, 9400 l. in B, and 1550 l. in C—was the value of the timber burnt. The Lloyd's policy was expressed to be "subject to average," but had no average clause attached. Held, that the system of marshalling the policies, so as to apply the Lloyd's policy and the company's policy for 3000 l. rateably to the loss in zone B, and the then unexhausted portion of the Lloyd's rateably with the other policies on zones C and A respectively, could not be introduced by the words "subject to average" in a Lloyd's policy. On this policy the plaintiffs, being insured on only a portion of the goods at risk, must be considered as being their own insurers for the difference, and must bear a rateable share of the loss accordingly. The underwriters were liable for 12,850 l. Whether the average clause is attached to a Lloyd's policy or not, if the policy is expressed to be "subject to average," it is according to the usage of Lloyd's the same as if the clause were attached. Action against justice—Issue of distress warrant—Limitation of action—Time of conviction or distress.—In February the defendant, who was a magistrate, convicted the plaintiff of an alleged offence against the Vaccination Acts, and in April the plaintiff having failed to pay the fine inflicted the defendant issued a warrant of distress, which was executed against the plaintiff's goods. In an action for illegal distress: Held, that the limitation imposed by sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 ran from the date of the issue of the warrant of distress and not from the date of the conviction. - so that the mayor is a borough justice virtute officii, he is not entitled to take the chair at a sitting within the borough of county justices where the court is sitting as a petty sessional division, and the fact that the offence being tried was committed entirely within the borough makes no difference. The expression "business of the borough," as used in the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, s. 155 (2), means the business which a court assembled by the mayor of a borough transacts. The business of a court sitting as a petty sessional division is county business and remains so, although the particular case being tried might have been treated as borough business. (*Lawson v. - Quarter sessions—Appeal from licensing justices—County solicitor—Disallowance of profit costs of justices' clerk—A county solicitor was appointed for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and paid a salary out of the county funds. His duty was to represent the justices in all judicial business affecting their acts as justices, including the defence of appeals from their decisions under the Licensing Acts. Held, that the quarter sessions were not entitled to disallow the profit costs of a clerk to justices, who had been retained to act for such justices upon an appeal against a decision under the Licensing Acts, merely because he was employed by the justices instead of the county solicitor. - LANDLORD AND TENANT.
- Covenant by lessor running with the reversion—Assignment of reversion by lessor—Liability of lessor to lessee after assignment—Award under arbitration clause—Covenant in new lease to perform award—Action on award—Merger.—At the expiration of a lease of an oil mill certain differences arose between the lessees and the lessors as to repairs and works to be done on the demised premises, and, these differences having, in pursuance of an arbitration clause in the lease, been referred to arbitration, the arbitrators awarded that certain millstones should be repaired by the lessors. Before the award was published the lessees took from the lessors a new lease which also contained a similar arbitration clause as to differences between the lessors and the lessees, and which, after reciting the reference to arbitration and that the award had not been published, contained a covenant that as soon as the award should be published the lessors should execute all the repairs therein stated to be within their province to repair. Subsequently both the lessees and the lessors assigned their interests in the premises, and, the lessors having refused to do the necessary repairs to the stones, the assignees of the lessees did the repairs, and brought an action on the award to recover the expenses from the lessors. Held, that the lessors' liability under the award to do the repairs was not merged or extinguished by the covenant in the new lease whereby the lessors covenanted to execute the repairs according to the award, and that an action on the award could be maintained by the lessees and their assignees for the expenses of the repairs which the lessors were bound to do, although there had been no reference to arbitration under the arbitration clause in the new lease.
- Seemle*: A lessor who assigns his reversion remains liable to the lessee upon an express covenant to do repairs to the demised premises—a covenant running with the reversion—as sect. 2 of the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, while giving to the lessee a right of action against the assignee of the lessor for breach of the covenant, does not release the lessor from his express covenant or from his liability thereunder. (Stuart and others v. Joy and Nantes.) ... 78
- Covenant by tenant to pay all charges—Paving expenses—Notice to tenant to pay—Payment by tenant—Deduction of amount paid from rent—Landlord's right to distrain for amount deducted.—The lease of a house contained a covenant on the part of the tenant to pay the rent free of all deductions except landlord's property tax, and to pay all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, and all charges imposed by any local authority upon the frontagers in respect of the taking over and the making and repair of the roads abutting on the premises. The local authority, having incurred expenses in paving the road and having apportioned the expenses among the frontagers, gave the tenant notice, under sect. 96 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act 1862, not to pay his rent without first deducting the amount of the paving expenses due to the local authority from the landlord as owner of the house. The amount of the expenses so claimed from the tenant exceeded the whole sum which he owed to his landlord as rent, and the tenant paid to the local authority the whole rent then due, in accordance with the notice. The landlord then demanded the rent from the tenant, which the tenant refused to pay, and thereupon the landlord distrained upon the tenant for the rent, the whole amount of which the tenant had paid to the local authority. Held, that the tenant having paid the whole amount of the rent to the local authority, as he was bound under the section to do, that payment was, under the section, to be taken as a payment of the rent, and that therefore the rent was gone and the landlord had no right to distrain for the same, though by the proviso at the end of the section the landlord's rights under the tenant's covenant to pay all such charges remained. - Distress for rent—Sale by auction—Purchase of goods by landlord—2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2—Practice—Appeal from County Court—Claim for less than 20l.—Appeal by leave—"Right of appeal."—Sect. 1, sub-sect. 5, of the Judicature Act 1894 applies to all cases in which an appeal has properly come before the High Court, whether it has come with leave or without leave. A landlord who has distrained for arrears of rent cannot himself purchase the goods distrained when they are sold by auction under 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2. (*Moore, Nettlefold, and Co. v. - Forfeiture—Nonpayment of rent—Judgment for possession against assignee of lease—Application by sublessee for relief.—The court has jurisdiction to grant relief to an underlessee under sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892 in case of forfeiture of the original lease for nonpayment of rent. - Lease—Breach of covenant—Covenant not to "do or suffer to be done" an act—Act done by sublessee—Liability of lessee.—The lease of a licensed public-house contained a covenant by the lessee, for himself and his assigns, that he would not do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licence might be forfeited or indorsed, or the renewal withheld. The defendant, who was the assignee of the lease, sublet the premises by a lease which contained covenants similar to those in the superior lease. The sublessee was convicted of an offence against the licensing laws committed on the premises and the licence was indorsed, in consequence whereof the renewal of the licence was subsequently refused. Held, that the defendant had not, within the meaning of the covenant, done or suffered to be done the act whereby the

In July 1896 the defendant company took a lease of certain premises, the lease containing a clause that, if the company should become bankrupt or insolvent or go into liquidation, the term should cease and determine and be void to all intents and purposes; and upon that there was power of re-entry. On the 8th Feb. 1901, in a debenture-holders' action brought on behalf of the debenture-holders to enforce their charge, a receiver and manager was appointed of the undertaking of the defendant company, and of all the present property whatsoever or wheresoever comprised in or subject to the security. On the 8th July 1903 an application was made in the debenture-holders' action that certain trade fixtures upon the premises, which were the subject of the lease of July 1896, might be sold by the receiver, and that the receiver might be at liberty to remove the same from the premises of the defendant company, and on the 24th Aug. 1903 an order was made accordingly. On the 16th Oct. 1903 the defendant company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding-up. On the 13th Nov. 1903 the reversioner of the premises, which were the subject of the lease of July 1896, applied to the receiver for delivery and possession of the same. Upon an application by the reversioner for an inquiry as to her interest in the premises and the buildings and fixtures thereon, and for delivery of possession of the premises by the receiver to the reversioner: Held, that the interest of the receiver in the premises was not concluded by the resolution of the 16th Oct. 1903, but that the receiver still retained the right to remove the fixtures during a reasonable time. Lease—Forfeiture—Proviso for re-entry—"Commit any breach of covenants to be performed"—Breach of covenant not to underlet without consent.—In a lease containing covenants by the lessee to pay rent, rates, and taxes, to repair, to repair within three months after notice, not to use the premises except for a specified purpose, and not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessor, there was a proviso for re-entry "if the lessee shall commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed." Held, that the proviso for re-entry applied to a breach of the covenant not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessor. (Harman v. Ainslie .)	624	Tithe—Agreement to pay tithe as further rent—Validity.—An agreement by a tenant to pay to his landlord a certain rent for a farm and "also by way of further rent so much as the landlord shall pay by way of tithe rentcharge on the said premises" is void by virtue of sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891. Lease for three years—Covenant by tenant to pay "outgoings"—Reconstruction of drainage by order of local authority—Liability of tenant.—By an agreement in writing the plaintiff let a house to the defendant for a term of three years, and then from year to year until either party should give three months' notice, at a yearly rent of 55 l. ; and the defendant agreed to pay "all outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises." During the term of three years the plaintiff expended 83 l. in reconstructing the drainage of the house in compliance with a notice from the local authority. Held, that the tenant was liable to pay the expense of doing this work as an "outgoing" within the meaning of the agreement, although the term was short and the rent small. (Stockdale v. Ascherberg .)	111	LEASE.
Mortgage—Lease by mortgagor after mortgage—Foreclosure—Payment of rent to mortgagee—Licence to tenant to grant underlease—Sale by mortgagee subject to tenancy—Estoppel in pais .—A lessee mortgaged leaseholds by subdemise in 1881, and in 1892 granted an underlease to a third party. In 1894 the mortgagee foreclosed, and the underlessee paid rent to him. In 1899 the mortgagee died, and his executors granted to the underlessee licence to grant a sublease of part of the premises, which he accordingly did. In 1900 they sold the premises, the assignment being made subject to the underlease. Held, that the mortgagee's executors having led to the belief that the reversion expectant upon the determination of the underlease was vested in them were estopped from averring the contrary; and that therefore the purchaser was not entitled to say that the underlease was not binding upon him. (Keith v. R. Gancia and Co. By an agreement in writing, dated the 25th Sept. 1902, T. agreed to let to G. a stall in the arcade on a yearly tenancy, and it was agreed that the tenant should "not carry on any business other than that of a librarian, news-agent, bookseller, or stationer." The plaintiff alleged that G. was selling articles which came within the covenant in the deed of the 30th Oct. 1901, and brought an action against T. and G. claiming an injunction restraining T. from letting or allowing to remain let and G. from using the premises comprised in his agreement for any of

At the next special sessions the owner of the beerhouse applied under sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1874 for the grant of a licence for the sale of beer and wine by retail in respect of the premises to a person who was then the resident-occupier of the premises. The licence was refused by the special sessions upon grounds other than one of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869. Held, upon the authority of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (81 L. T. Rep. 221; (1899) 2 Q. B. 607)—the distinction between the application, as in that case, to a court of summary jurisdiction for an authority to carry on the business in the meantime, and the application to the special sessions for the grant of a licence, being for this purpose immaterial—that sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 applied, and that consequently the special sessions had not a general discretion to refuse the licence, but could only refuse the same upon one or other of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of that Act. Merger— Res judicata .—By an indenture of lease dated the 20th Aug. 1880 W. demised certain property to M. for a term of ninety-five years at the rent of 222l. 5s. 6d. By a mortgage dated the 24th June 1881 M. demised the term, less three days, at a peppercorn rent to H. to secure 2000l. and further advances. Eight thousand pounds was now due on the security. M. procured a conveyance of the fee on the 27th March 1882, and in 1883 sold to F., the conveyance being expressed to be subject to the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880. In July 1902 M. became bankrupt, his trustee disclaimed the lease, and on the 5th May 1903 an order was made by the registrar of the Warwick County Court that H.'s representatives should be excluded from all interest in the lease, and that the same should be vested in a purchaser from F., unless H.'s representatives declared their option to accept a vesting order of the lease. H.'s representatives did not appeal from the order in bankruptcy, but now asked (1) a declaration that the term created by the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880, subject to the subterm created by the mortgage of the 24th June 1881, became merged and extinguished on the conveyance of the fee to M.; and (2) a declaration that H.'s representatives were entitled to the premises for the residue of the term created by the mortgage, subject only to a peppercorn rent and the equity of redemption. Held, that the County Court judge had full jurisdiction to determine the question of merger, and that, as H.'s representatives had not appealed from the registrar's decision, they were estopped by the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, and could not have the question tried over again. Held, also, that, even if there were no estoppel, there was no merger, as it was for the benefit of M. and his intention to keep the term subsisting. (Lea v. Thursby .) 667		Objection to licence—Not required—Evidence.—On an appeal to quarter sessions against the refusal of licensing justices to grant the renewal of a licence on the ground that the licence was not required in the locality or neighbourhood, evidence was given by a surveyor, who produced an Ordnance Survey map, that within a certain radius of the licensed house objected to there were a large number of licensed houses and beerhouses, that for ten years the house in question had been licensed, and the neighbourhood, which was thickly populated, had not altered except that the population had increased. It was also proved that the neighbourhood was troublesome to the police. The objection to the licence had been served by the direction of the licensing justices. Held (dissentiente Kennedy, J.), that there was no evidence justifying the quarter sessions in refusing to grant the renewal of the licence. (Raven and another, apps. v. Southampton Justices, resps.) ... 94
(See COMPENSATION—LANDLORD AND TENANT.)		Order taken by traveller—Appropriation—Sale off licensed premises.—An order for beer having been given to the traveller of a person licensed to retail beer at his premises by a customer at such customer's house, the traveller handed the order to the licensee at the licensed premises, who appropriated the beer by placing it in a box at those premises with a piece of paper on which was the customer's name. The beer was delivered and paid for at the customer's house. Held, that this was not a sale off the licensed premises. (Walker, app. v. Walker, resp.) 88
LEGACY DUTY.		Sale of beer—Sale at unlicensed place—Canvasser employed to take orders at customers' houses—Duty of canvasser to transmit orders—Acceptance of order and appropriation at licensed premises—Executory contract of sale at customer's house.—The appellant, a brewer who was licensed for the sale by retail of liquors at his licensed premises, employed one C. to obtain orders for the appellant's beer from persons in a certain district, and subsequently to deliver the beer so ordered at the houses of the persons ordering the same. In obtaining the orders and delivering the beer, C. was required to observe certain rules to the effect that no beer was to be delivered unless the same had been previously ordered and the order had been entered in an order-book and sent to the licensed premises the day before the order was to be executed, and no money was to be taken for the beer by the person taking the order until the goods were delivered. These rules were not known by, or communicated to, customers. Postcards were also given to C. for the use of customers upon which they could send their orders; but these were not always given to persons on whom he called. In accordance with his usual course of business, C. called at a customer's house and received an order for a jar of beer. He entered the order in his order-book, which on the next day was sent on to the appellant at his licensed premises, where the order was accepted and the jar was appropriated to the customer at the licensed premises. The jar was placed on the appellant's cart and was delivered to the customer at his house, where it was paid for on delivery. Held, that what took place at the customer's house was merely the taking of an order to be forwarded on to the licensed premises, to be there dealt with by the appellant, and that, therefore, there was no evidence of any contract, whether executory or otherwise, for the sale of the beer made at the customer's house, and that the appellant could not be convicted under sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1873 of selling the beer at a place where he was not authorised to do so by his licence. 		By-law—Building—"Place of habitual employment for any person in any business"—Stables of building contractor.—By by-law No. 2 certain buildings, which should not be constructed or adapted to be used "as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business," were to be exempt from the by-laws relating to new buildings. Held, that a building divided into three parts, consisting of a rain goods store, a timber store, and stables, used by a building contractor, was not a building used "as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business" even although part consisted of the stables. (Linzell, app. v. Felixstowe and Walton Urban District Council, resps.)	389

		By-law—Erecting shed—Neglecting to comply with notice—Sufficiency of notice.—By certain by-laws Nos. 53 and 96 it was provided that if any person should erect new domestic buildings certain open space was to be provided, and anyone who was intending to erect a building was to give notice to the council and deliver plans thereof, a description of the materials to be used, and other details. By by-law No. 98, where a person who has erected a building or done any other work to which the by-laws apply receives a notice in writing specifying any matters in respect of which the erection or the work is in contravention of any by-law, such person must cause anything done in contravention to be amended. A notice was served stating: "I am directed . . . to call your attention to the fact that a wooden erection has been made . . . contrary to Nos. 53 and 96 of the by-laws. . . ." Held, that such notice was sufficient. (Dickinson, app. r. Forsyth, resp.)	30
		Hoarding—"Abutting" on street.—A hoarding for advertisements, 60ft. long and 12ft. above a hedge, no part of such hoarding being nearer to the street than 2ft. and having the hedge between it and the street, does not "abut" on the street. (Barnett, app. v. Covell, resp.)	29
		Private Act—Inconsistency with public Act.—By a private Act of 1894 the appellants were specially authorised to do certain works and to make and maintain in connection with the works so authorised (inter alia) all necessary and proper buildings and other works on any lands within the limits of deviation. The erection of a certain building on lands within the limits of deviation was rendered necessary by works so authorised. Held, that the interference and control involved in sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 was inconsistent with the powers conferred by the private Act, and so the appellants were not bound to serve on the respondents a notice under that section in respect of such building. (Surrey Commercial Dock Company, apps. v. Mayor, &c., of Bermondsey, resps.)	123
		Private street works—Apportionment of expenses on frontager—Notice of objection—Objection that street is not a street within meaning of Act—Evidence that street is repairable by inhabitants at large—Admissibility.—Sect. 7 of the Private Street Works Act 1892 enables the owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing private street works under the Act to serve a written notice on the urban authority, objecting to the proposals of the urban authority, on the grounds (amongst others): (a) That an alleged street is not a street within the meaning of the Act; and (b) that a street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; and by sect. 5 a "street" means a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, "and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." Formation of school district and incorporation of board of managers—Sale of property belonging to board of managers and investment of proceeds—Dissolution of district by Local Government Board—Postponement of dissolution—Transfer of Consols—Bank of England—Orders of Local Government Board.—The Local Government Board made an order dissolving a metropolitan school district under the Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869 as from a date therein mentioned. By subsequent orders the date of dissolution was further extended, but ultimately the district was dissolved. At the date of dissolution a sum of Consols was standing at the Bank of England to the credit of the board of managers of the dissolved union. The Local Government Board made an order directing the last acting managers of the dissolved district to transfer the Consols to certain poor law authorities in the order named in the proportions therein mentioned. The Bank of England refused to recognise the validity of the order or the powers of the last acting managers to transfer the Consols, insisting that if the corporate board of managers was in existence it could only transfer the Consols under its seal, and that if it was not in existence a vesting order was required. An action having been brought by the last acting managers for a declaration of their right to transfer: Held, that, on the dissolution of a district constituted under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1845, the corporate board of such district constituted under sect. 45 of that Act continues to exist, while the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, s. 12, does not automatically vest the property of the district in the last acting managers, and consequently that the plaintiffs could transfer the Consols under their seal as a corporate board. It is doubtful whether, when once the Local Government Board has dissolved a district under the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, it has power to set it up again or to continue the managers for more than a period of twelve months except for a certain purpose specified on the face of the order. Alteration of boundaries—Creation of new urban district—Adjustment of property and liabilities.—The loss of a portion of a ratepaying area does not support a claim for an adjustment of "property, income, debts, liabilities, or expenses," within the meaning of sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1888. Therefore where a parish forming part of a rural district was made into a separate urban district by an order of the county council under the Act, and before the alteration the contribution out of the rates of that parish towards the expense of maintaining the highways in the rural district had largely exceeded

On the death of a younger child, whose portion had vested, but had not been raised, intestate and unmarried, the portion devolved upon the settlor as sole next of kin, but he did not take out administration to his son's estate, and on his death his testamentary dispositions (which, however, were executed at a date prior to his son's death) contained no reference to the portion. On an originating summons taken out by the trustees of his will, the question was raised whether the portion which devolved upon him on the death of his son sank into the estates upon which it was charged and of which the settlor was absolute owner subject to the interests and terms created by the settlement, or whether it continued to subsist and formed part of his personal estate: Held, that it was for the benefit of the settlor that the portion should sink into the estates, and that it had merged in the inheritance thereof. Public health—Sanitary authority—Power to provide "public sanitary conveniences"—Subway—Subsoil of highway—Vesting in sanitary authority—Right of adjoining owner usque ad medium flumen —Trespass.—Where a sanitary authority, purporting to act under the powers conferred upon them by sect. 44 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, had constructed beneath the middle of a street certain public lavatories and sanitary conveniences, with requisite and proper means of approach thereto and exit therefrom on both sides of the street so that the approaches in fact constituted a subway for crossing the street, the entrances to the subway being by staircases placed at each side of the street at or near the edge of the footway, it was held that the sanitary authority had been exercising the powers conferred by the statute for a purpose not thereby authorised, they having no power to acquire lands for the purpose of constructing a subway; and that therefore the plaintiffs, opposite the doors of whose premises one of the entrances to the subway was placed, were entitled to a mandatory injunction to restrain the trespass. LUNACY.		METROPOLIS.
Administration of lunatic's property—Permanent additions to and improvements of freehold estates—Orders for payment of expenditure out of personal estate—Jurisdiction.—Sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 gives the court jurisdiction to make a charge upon the real estate of a lunatic for the whole or any part of any moneys expended under a previous order for the permanent improvement, security, or advantage of such property, unless in making the previous order the judge had that section before his mind and deliberately exercised the jurisdiction conferred by it. The by-laws further provided a penalty upon any breach thereof. There was no provision as to notice to the landlord or owner. Held, that the by-law was bad on the ground that it was not reasonable. Application of property for maintenance of lunatic—Jurisdiction of Chancery Division.—Where a person of unsound mind not so found, who was detained in an asylum abroad, was absolutely entitled to certain trust property in this country, and directions were desired as to her maintenance thereout, the Court of Appeal (acting under the jurisdiction in Chancery), upon an undertaking by the trustees to bring the trust property into court, ordered that the interest thereof should, during the lifetime of the lunatic, or until further order, be paid to the lunatic's sister, who was one of the trustees, she undertaking to apply the same for the maintenance of the lunatic. Carr.)	592	Drainage—Low-lying land—Dwelling-houses on—Houses capable of being drained by gravitation for greater part of year—Houses so situate "as not to admit of being drained by gravitation"—Permission of council for erection—Time for taking proceedings.—The appellant erected ten houses, intended to be used as dwelling-houses, on low-lying land, the surface of which was below the level of Trinity high-water mark. During the greater part of the year these houses admitted of being, and were in fact, drained by gravitation through an intermediate sewer into a main sewer, which was an existing sewer of the London County Council; but for some days in the year, in times of considerable rainfall, the main sewer became full of flood water, and so the water in the main sewer, by closing a hinged flap at the junction of the intermediate sewer, kept the sewage back in the intermediate sewer and prevented it from going into the main sewer, and on those days the houses could not be drained into the main sewer. There was no other existing sewer of the council into which they could be drained by gravitation. Upon informations under sects. 122 and 200 (9) of the London Building Act 1894 against the appellant for erecting, without the permission of the council, upon such low-lying land dwelling-houses which were so situate "as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council": Held, that as the houses were capable of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council for the greater part of the year, the fact that for some days in the year they could not be so drained, owing to the flood water in the main sewer keeping back the sewage in the intermediate sewer, did not

But this is not to apply to a case under sect. 116, sub-sect. 1 (d), where the title contains a reference to the statutes 53 Vict. c. 5 and 54 & 55 Vict. c. 65. Therefore, a notice having been given under sect. 4 (2), a court of summary jurisdiction can make an order under sect. 5 prohibiting a recurrence of the nuisance and specifying works to be executed, where the only notice served has been under sect. 4 (2), if such court is satisfied that the nuisance, although abated, is likely to recur. On the hearing of informations and complaints under sect. 5 (1) (b), the respondents proved the nuisances alleged, but offered no evidence as to how the black smoke which caused the nuisances had been caused or as to what works were necessary to abate or prevent such nuisances. The appellants' witnesses stated that the black smoke might have been caused by two furnace doors being open at the same time. The magistrate determined that the respondents were entitled to a prohibition order, and thereupon the appellants required that the order should specify the works they were to execute under sect. 5 (5), but insisted that, the case being closed, the magistrate was precluded from hearing further evidence as to the works necessary. The magistrate therefore added to his prohibition order a direction to the appellants to fit up apparatus to prevent the furnace doors being opened simultaneously. Held, that the order was valid. Drains—By-laws—Reconstruction of drain of old building—Necessity of intercepting trap—Work "in any building." —By a by-law made under the powers of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 it was provided that every person who should construct or reconstruct any pipe or drain, or other means of communicating with sewers, so far as he should effect any such works "in any building" erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, should provide in such drain a suitable and efficient intercepting trap. Held, that the word "in"—in the words "in any building"—meant, not "inside the building," but "in connection with the building," and that consequently the by-law applied to the reconstruction of a drain in connection with an old building erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, as the reconstruction of the drain was a work "in" such building, although such drain was outside the building, and that such drain ought to be reconstructed with an efficient intercepting trap, as required by the by-law. New drainage—Removal of old disused drains—By-law or regulation and direction. —By regulation 29 of the respondents all disused drains were to be broken up and destroyed, and the materials and foul earth removed and dry earth, ballast, or brick rubbish substituted. By sect. 83 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 a penalty is provided if any drain thereinbefore mentioned is found not to have been provided according to the directions or regulations of the respondents. The appellants constructed new drains, which were connected with the respondents' sewer. On the premises were old disused drains which were not physically joined or connected with the new drains. The old drains were not taken out. Held, that the regulation was rightly made, and the appellants were properly convicted for constructing the new drain not in accordance with the directions of the respondents. Smoke from tug—Nuisance—"Chimney" —Prohibition order—Specifying works.—The funnel of a tug plying to and fro in the river Thames, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority of London, is a "chimney" within sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. If a court of summary jurisdiction makes a prohibition order under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, such order need not specify the works to be done by the person against whom the order is made if in the opinion of the court no works could be done to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance. The Act provided that nothing therein contained should be construed to diminish the rights of the lord of the manor in respect to his seignory and royalties except in respect of his ownership of the soil to be inclosed. And the Act further provided that the lord and his successors should hold and enjoy all mines and quarries under the waste together with liberty of searching for, winning and working the same, as fully and freely as if that Act had not been passed, and that without making or paying any satisfaction for so doing. And the Act further provided a summary means by which any person injured through the lord's working of the mines should be compensated by the occupiers of allotments in the same township. The company were desirous of paying off the loan before the expiration of the twelve months, and the respondent gave notice that he intended to exercise his option of purchasing. The company thereupon brought an action claiming a declaration that the agreement was not binding on them, and for consequential relief, and the appellant counter-claimed for specific performance or damages. NUISANCE.

Electric lighting works—Vibration and noise.—Borough council—Injunction.—Under a provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament, the St. P. Borough Council supplied electricity in the borough, and for this purpose had an electric generating station about 50ft. from the nearest point of a row of houses. The provisional order provided that nothing contained in it should exonerate the council from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them. In May 1903 the council began to run new and enlarged works and machinery at the generating station, including two engines each of about 750 horse-power. The lessees and occupiers of the row of houses complained that the new machinery increased an already existing nuisance by vibration and noise so as to interfere with their comfort and enjoyment, cause injury to health, and diminish the value of their interests in their houses; and they brought an action against the council claiming an injunction restraining them from causing nuisance to the plaintiffs and damaging their interests in their houses by vibration and noise from the electric generating station, and damages. The defendants contended that the vibration and noise were due to certain defects in the balance of the engines which they were endeavouring to remedy, and which they ought to be allowed time to remedy completely. Held, on the evidence, that the vibration and noise were productive of an amount of annoyance against which the plaintiffs were entitled to be protected on the principle laid down in Broder v. Saillard (2 Ch. Div. 692) and Bamford v. Turley (6 L. T. Rep. 721; 3 B. & S. 62); that the annoyance was not merely temporary and occasional, but calculated to work material injury to the plaintiffs' property; that the defendants were not entitled to carry on their works unless they could do so without occasioning a nuisance; and that an injunction must be granted, with an inquiry as to damages. Noise, vibration, and smell—Electrical works—Generating station—Injunction.—By a provisional order made under the Electric Lighting Acts, and duly confirmed by Act of Parliament, the corporation of R. were authorised to supply electrical energy for public and private purposes within the area of the borough; it being provided by the order that nothing therein should exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them. The corporation entered into arrangements with the defendant company for the erection, maintaining, and working of a generating station within the borough; and the defendant company, in pursuance of such arrangements, acquired as a site for the proposed works a piece of land adjoining the garden of the plaintiff's house, and proceeded to erect therein the requisite engines, dynamos, and other machinery. The plaintiff, who occupied her house as a ladies' school, complained of various annoyances to the inmates of her establishment by noise, vibration, and offensive smells or vapours produced by the operation of the defendant company's works, and instituted an action for an injunction and damages in respect of the alleged nuisance. The court being of opinion that the annoyances complained of were not trivial or a kind to be expected from any ordinary and reasonable use by the defendant company of the land they had acquired, and, further, that, in spite of a diminution in intensity and frequency of the annoyances complained of since the commencement of the action, yet even at the date of the trial such annoyances had repeatedly and recently occurred, an injunction and damages were granted accordingly. Public and private nuisance—Smallpox hospital—Injunction—Public convenience—Public health—Scientific evidence as to the effects of similar hospitals.—A quia timet action was brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of certain owners and occupiers in a district near a populous city, and by the same owners and occupiers as plaintiffs to restrain the use by the corporation of the city of certain buildings as a smallpox hospital, both as a public and a private nuisance. Held, that to succeed in such a case it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show, not merely that inconvenience may be experienced or a sentiment of danger may exist; but a strong probability, amounting to a moral certainty that the hospital, if established, will be an actionable nuisance, and that the plaintiffs having failed to show this, that their action must be dismissed. In the course of the trial the plaintiffs adduced scientific evidence to show from the experience of other smallpox hospitals that such hospitals tended by aerial convection to spread the disease; and rebutting scientific evidence was adduced by the defendants. At the desire of the parties his Lordship heard the evidence; but expressed considerable doubt as to its admissibility. (Attorney-General v. Mayor, &c., of Nottingham.)... 308

for travelling without a ticket—Injunction.—Articles of partnership provided that the managing partner, in the event of either of the other partners being addicted to notorious intemperance or immorality or other scandalous conduct detrimental to the partnership business or at any time during the partnership permitting or being guilty of any flagrant breach of any of the duties of a partner, should be at liberty to remove either or both of them from the partnership on giving them six days' notice in writing. One of the partners was convicted by a police magistrate of travelling on a railway without a ticket with intent to avoid payment and fined the full penalty, and thereupon the managing partner gave him notice expelling him from the partnership. On motion by the partner for an interim injunction to restrain his expulsion: Held, that, as the plaintiff had been convicted of dishonesty, the case was within the expulsion clause, and that there was ample justification for the notice of dissolution, and the court declined to interfere by injunction. (Carmichael v. Evans.) 573		preparation as a preparation of the plaintiffs'. Messrs. T. contended that "Absorbine" ought not to have been registered as a trade mark, and moved to expunge it from the register. Held, that "Absorbine" was not an invented word, since the first two syllables formed an ordinary English word, and the last was a meaningless flourish or termination, and there was no invention in continuing the syllables; and that it must therefore be expunged from the register, and the action be dismissed. 		Pension—Approved service—Continuous service—Break in service.—The "approved service" referred to in sect. 1 of the Police Act 1890 must be continuous service to entitle a constable to a pension. (Garbutt, app. v. Durham Joint Committee, resps.) 26
		POOR LAW.
PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.		Overseers—Distress for rates—Illegal distress by assistant overseer—Liability of overseers for illegal acts of assistant overseer.—Overseers are not liable virtute officii for an illegal and excessive distress by an assistant overseer in the execution of a distress warrant for non-payment of rates. A distress warrant for nonpayment of rates was issued by justices, addressed in the usual statutory form to the overseers and constables, and it was handed by one of the overseers to the assistant overseer of the parish, who had been duly appointed to act as such assistant overseer. The assistant overseer, while purporting to execute the distress warrant, was guilty of an illegal and excessive distress, the overseers having taken no part in the same. Held, that the overseers were not liable for the illegal acts of the assistant overseer in executing the warrant. (Baker and Wife v. Wicks and others.) 705
Design—Registration—Infringement—Patent and registered design for same invention—Second registered design similar to previous design—Marking goods—Registration of design not known to infringer—Injunction—Damages.—The plaintiffs registered a design for improvements in motor cycles between the time when they applied for and the time when they obtained letters patent for a similar invention. Subsequently they registered a new design, which in fact was similar to the originally registered design, and sold machines marked with the second registration number only. The fact of the registration was unknown to the defendants prior to the issue of the writ in an action against them for infringement, but they sold some machines after the writ was issued, and on an application for an interim injunction they offered to keep an account. Held, that a patent and a registered design for the same invention might co-exist, the rights conferred did not clash, and the registration was valid; that the first registration was not forfeited; and that want of knowledge was not a reason why an injunction should not be granted, but that it protected the defendants from payment of damages in respect of sales effected by them before writ. (Werner Motors Limited v. A. W. Gamage Limited.) 342		Removal of pauper—Settlement—Married woman—Husband having no settlement—Derivative settlement.—A pauper and her husband, who was a foreigner with no settlement, came to reside in the parish of Birmingham in Jan. 1901, and resided there until June 1901, when the husband went to America with no intention of deserting his wife, and with the intention of returning. The wife and her children continued to reside in the parish of Birmingham until March 1902, when they went into the workhouse. Held, that the pauper and her children, who were all under the age of sixteen years, were irremovable from the parish of Birmingham. (Tewkesbury Guardians v. Birmingham Guardians.) 787
Patent action—Petition for revocation—Liberty to apply for leave to amend by disclaimer—Conditions as to infringement prior to order—Discretion of judge.—Where a patent is ordered to be revoked unless within a certain time the patentee obtains leave to amend by disclaimer, the judge has a discretion as to the terms on which he will give the patentee the opportunity of obtaining the leave to amend, and such discretion will only be reviewed by the Court of Appeal in exceptional cases. Trade mark—"Invented word"—"Absorbine"—Removal from register.—Y., a manufacturing chemist, residing in America, obtained in Nov. 1901 the registration in the United Kingdom of the word "Absorbine" as a trade mark in respect of chemical substances used for agricultural, horticultural, veterinary, and sanitary purposes, and also in respect of chemical substances prepared for use in medicine and pharmacy. He used the word in connection with a liquid preparation designed to absorb and remove various growths and diseases in animals. Messrs. T. were well-known manufacturers of an ointment intended for similar purposes, which they sold under the name of "Absorbent" till 1901, but about the time of Y.'s registration of "Absorbine" they, without any knowledge of that fact, changed the name of their ointment to "Absorbine," and sold it under that name. Y. and his English agents, Messrs. C., brought an action against them to restrain them from infringing the registered trade mark "Absorbine," and from passing off any veterinary		PRACTICE.
		Administration—Common order for administration against executor—Subsequent action by same plaintiff charging wilful default and fraud—No evidence of fresh information acquired since date of common order—Leave of the court.—A plaintiff who has obtained a common order for administration of an estate against the executor may obtain the leave of the court to bring a fresh action charging (inter alia) wilful default against the executor without proving that he did not acquire the information on which he founds his fresh action in time to utilise it in the former proceeding in which he obtained the common order for administration, proof of which was required in the case of Laming v. Gee (40 L. T. Rep. 33; 10 Ch. Div. 715), on the plaintiff, who was an undischarged bankrupt, giving security to the satisfaction of the master for the executor's costs of the fresh action. The plaintiff applied for leave to deliver interrogatories to the defendants asking them whether they had not previously published an incorrect statement about the plaintiff, what information they had which induced them to believe that statement was true, from whom they derived such information, whether it was derived from the same source as the article complained of, and what steps they had taken to verify it. Held (dismissing the appeal), that leave to deliver the interrogatories had been properly refused as not being relevant to the question of malice. (Caryll v. Daily Mail Publishing Company.)	307
Appeal—Specially indorsed writ—Action by consent referred to master—Decision of master—Right to appeal to Divisional Court from decision of master.—An appeal does not lie to the Divisional Court from the decision of a master in an action which has been referred to him by consent of the parties under Order XIV., r. 7, which provides that, upon the hearing of an application for leave to enter final judgment, "with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master." (Fraser v. Fraser.)	709	Discovery—Production—Privilege—Further affidavit—Sufficiency—Omission of statement by party that documents for which protection is claimed contain nothing impeaching his own case.—In an action to enforce the right to profit made upon an alleged joint purchase and resale of land and an account, defendant had counter-claimed for specific performance of an alleged agreement between him and the plaintiff as to certain properties purchased by defendant and, as alleged, by the plaintiff and defendant jointly and payments to be made, for a sale, and the execution of a proper conveyance. Defendant in an affidavit of documents had sworn that he objected to produce certain documents on the ground that they related only to his own case, and did not tend to prove or support the plaintiff's case. Held, that the affidavit was technically sufficient, although not containing the statement that the documents for which privilege was claimed contained nothing impeaching his own case. (Johnson v. Whitaker.)	535
Appeal on question of fact—Concurrent findings of two courts below.—There is no rule of practice in the House of Lords that the House will not entertain an appeal on a question of fact where there have been concurrent findings in the courts below. Compromise—Distribution of fund among bondholders—Limitations of times for claims by absent parties. (La Compania de los Ferrocarriles de Zaragoza v. Held, that the court or a judge has jurisdiction under this rule to make an order for the examination of a person who has been a director of the company, though he may have ceased to hold that office. (Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France v. Johann Maria Farina and Co.)	472
Costs—Action settled—"Record withdrawn. No costs on either side"—Costs of interlocutory proceedings ordered to be paid by plaintiff—Right of defendant to tax after settlement of action.—During the progress of an action several orders were made, upon interlocutory applications, that the plaintiff should pay the defendants' costs, in some cases "in any event." The action was subsequently settled upon the terms, indorsed on the briefs of counsel, "Record withdrawn. No costs on either side," the question of the costs of the interlocutory proceedings not being present to their minds. Held, that after the settlement of the action the defendants were entitled to taxation and payment of their costs of the interlocutory proceedings which the plaintiff had been ordered to pay. (Walter v. Bewicke, Moreing, and Co.)	409	Receiver—Writ of possession—Time.—Where an order was made directing delivery of certain premises into the possession of a receiver appointed by the order, but no time within which delivery of possession was to be made was specified in the order, it was held that a writ of possession could not issue because Order XLI., r. 5, had not been complied with. (Savage v. Bentley.)	641
Costs—Application for judgment or new trial—Costs of successful applicant—Discretion of court.—Where an application is made to the Court of Appeal for judgment or a new trial on appeal from a judgment and verdict at a trial before a judge and jury, on the ground of misdirection or otherwise, and such application is opposed by the other side, but a new trial is granted, although there is no absolute rule applicable to all such cases, and the court has a discretion either to give or refrain from giving, or to reserve the costs of the successful application to abide the result of the new trial, yet, in the absence of special circumstances, prima facie the costs of the successful application ought to be borne by the party who opposed it. The order made in Bray v. Ford (73 L. T. Rep. 609; (1896) A. C. 44) is not to be considered as an order laying down any general rule upon the point, but merely as an order in that particular case. (Hamilton v. - Commission—"When and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."—The defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff commission on the sale of an hotel "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty." The plaintiff introduced a purchaser, who signed a contract to purchase with the defendant, and paid a deposit. The purchaser was unable to carry out the contract, and the defendant agreed to release her, and he was to retain the deposit. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his commission. (Chapman v. - Mistake—Money paid to agent—Remittance to banker—Credit given by banker to customer—Remittance made by mistake—Recovery back from banker by payer.—K. was a merchant, financed by two banks. These banks were each in the habit of advancing money to K. on the security of the shipping documents of goods, bought by him. When he sold such goods he was in the habit of obtaining from them the necessary documents to enable him to deliver the goods, and at the same time assigning to them the purchase money. On receipt of the purchase money from the purchasers of the goods, the banks would credit the amount to K.'s account. The plaintiffs bought several parcels of goods from K., and received from him notice of the assignment of the purchase money. The purchase money of some of the parcels was assigned to one bank, and of the other parcels to the other bank. Through a mistake of their clerk the whole of the money payable by the plaintiffs in respect of all these parcels of goods was paid over by them to only one of the banks, with instructions to credit K.'s account with the amount. This was accordingly done by the bank under the belief that the whole of the money was rightly paid over to them. On discovering the over-payment, the plaintiffs asked the bank to return it. The bank refused. In an action to recover back the money: Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the return from the bank of the money that had been thus paid them by mistake. (Continental Caoutchouc and Gutta Percha Company v. Kleinwort, Sons, and Co.) ... 474
- Secret commission—Corrupt bargain—Confirmation by principal—Evidence—Necessity of full knowledge of all facts.—The defendant, acting through his agent, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs, who were shipbuilders, for the building of a ship. Before the contract was arranged the plaintiffs secretly agreed to give a commission to the defendant's agent. At an interview which afterwards took place between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to the payment by him of money due under this contract, the plaintiffs informed him that they had agreed to pay commission to the agent, and the defendant, after being so informed, paid them a small sum on account. The plaintiffs afterwards brought an action to recover the balance due to them. At the trial of the action it was held that, by reason of the plaintiff's secret agreement to give a commission to the defendant's agent, the contract was one which entitled the defendant to repudiate, but that by what had occurred at his interview with the plaintiffs he had confirmed the contract and debarred himself from repudiating it: (83 L. T. Rep. 286). On appeal: Held, that the plaintiffs had not shown that there had been a full disclosure to the defendant of all the circumstances in connection with the plaintiffs' agreement to pay commission to the agent, and that therefore there had been no such confirmation by the defendant of his contract as debarred him from repudiating it. (Bartram and Sons v. Lloyd.) ... 357
- Underwriter—Authority of underwriter to write names—Ordinary business at Lloyd's—Guarantee policy—Policy underwritten for private purposes and benefit of agent—Liability of principal.—When an agent, having express authority to make a particular kind of contract on behalf of his principal, makes such a contract in the name of his principal with a person who deals in good faith, the principal is liable although the agent in fact makes the contract for his own purposes and in his own interests, and not in the interests of his principal. - Mortgage—Insurance of mortgage debt—Contract of insurance or suretyship—Covenant by surety with limited liability—Contribution.—By an indenture made between H. of the first part, D. of the second part, and a bank of the third part, H. mortgaged a public-house to secure £4000 and interest, and H. and D. covenanted to pay the £4000 and interest. There was a proviso that D., who was a surety, should not be liable for more than £1000 and interest. H. covenanted to insure the security in the name of the bank with an assurance company. In the proposal for a policy it was stated "D. will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing £1000 of the mortgage money." An insurance was accordingly effected with the plaintiff company, and by the policy it was provided that the proposal was to be deemed to be incorporated with the policy, and the company agreed that if the mortgagor made default the company would pay the principal and interest; and it was provided that thereupon the bank (therein called the insured) should assign the mortgage debt and all securities to the company, and do all things necessary for the purpose of enforcing any rights or remedies, or of obtaining relief or indemnity from other parties to which the company should be subrogated upon payment under the policy. The mortgagor having made default, the company paid the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, and moneys expended in preservation of the property, amounting in all to nearly £5000. They realized £4000. and claimed the balance from D. Held, that the plaintiff company and D. were not co-sureties; that the company had guaranteed the payment of the money, and D. was liable for the amount claimed. Building by-laws—Deposit of plans—Change of by-laws after approval of plans—Row of houses—Part of work carried out—Right to complete according to approved plans.—Sect. 27 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 provided that the deposit with the corporation of any plan of any street or building should be null and void "if the execution of the work specified in such plan should not be commenced within three years from the date of such deposit." In 1894 a builder deposited a plan showing thereon a number of houses which he proposed to erect, and which were in accordance with the building by-laws then in force in the borough. The plan was approved by the corporation. Some of the houses were built and completed, and certificates were given on their completion by the corporation. In Nov. 1901 the building by-laws in force in the borough were repealed "except as regards any work commenced before that date," and on the same day new by-laws came into force with which the plan that had been deposited by the builder in 1894 did not comply. Held, that the plan approved in 1894 was not merely the plan of one building, but was really a number of separate plans for the buildings shown thereon; that therefore the completion of some of the houses shown on the plan was not a commencement of the other buildings there shown, which were not in fact begun till after the new by-laws came into force, and the defendant was not entitled to go on with the work under the old by-laws. Dickinson.)... ..	41	London—By-laws—Lodging-house—Cleansing at stated times—Liability of "landlord"—No provision in by-law for notice to landlord—Validity of by-law.—Under the provisions of sect. 94 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, by which sanitary authorities are enjoined to make by-laws for (amongst other things) "the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of the premises"—that is, "of a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family"—a metropolitan borough council made by-laws wherein "lodging-house" was defined as "a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family." One of these by-laws provided that "the landlord of a lodging-house shall in the first week of the month of April in every year cause every part of the premises to be cleansed." The by-law contained no provision as to the giving of notice to the "landlord," who was defined as including the person who received or was entitled to receive the rack rent of the lodging-house or the profits arising from the letting. Held, that the by-law was unreasonable and bad, in that it did not provide for notice of the state of the premises to be given to the landlord, who was thereby made responsible, before making him liable for a breach of the by-law. Held, further, by Wills, J., that the by-law was also bad upon the ground that the work was required to be done in the first week in April, which frequently included the Easter holidays, when there would be a great difficulty in getting sufficient labour to do work which might require several days. (Stiles, app. v. Galinski, resp.; Nokes and Nokes, app. v. Mayor, &c., of Islington, resps.)	437
Dangerous structure—Costs incurred by authority—Costs of appellant where respondent does not appear—Practice.—Sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 does not apply to sect. 75 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, incorporated in the Act of 1875 by sect. 160. Expenses of putting up a hoarding under sect. 75 of the Act of 1847 can be therefore recovered, although three months have not elapsed since the demand. Costs may be granted in a proper case against a respondent, the defendant before the justices, even although he does not appear upon the appeal. (Usk Urban District Council, apps. v. Mortimer, resp.)	25	Nuisance—"Intimation" notice by inspector to abate—Compliance with "intimation" without statutory notice—Work which sanitary authority ought to have done—Compulsion—Right of owner to recover expenses as for work done under compulsion.—An owner of premises received a written intimation under sect. 3 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, duly signed by the officer of the sanitary authority, making known to him the existence of a nuisance at his premises and requesting him to abate the same within seven days, otherwise the sanitary authority would commence proceedings against him by the service of a statutory notice. The owner, without waiting for the service of the statutory notice under sect. 4 of the Act requiring him to abate the nuisance, did the necessary works to abate the nuisance, in the course of which he discovered that the work was a sewer and not a drain, but without communicating with the sanitary authority he completed the work, and brought an action against the sanitary authority to recover the expenses as for work done by him under compulsion which the sanitary authority were legally compellable to do. Held, but only on the authority of Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (59 J. P. 580), that work done under an "intimation" given under sect. 3 is not work done under compulsion, and that as the owner had not waited for the statutory notice under sect. 4, but had done the work under the "intimation" notice, the work was not done by him under compulsion, and he was not entitled to recover the expenses of the work. Quarre , whether, if an owner wrongfully converts that which is properly a drain, for the repair of which
Drain on private ground—Draining several houses—Drain or sewer—"Single private drain."—J. was the owner of twelve houses, at the rear of which runs a main or common drain with which each of the houses connects. The sewage is conveyed from the main or common drain through a branch drain into the public sewer. The sewage of four other houses, belonging to two other owners, is conveyed by the main or common drain, which also runs at the rear of those four houses, into the said branch drain. Both the main or common drain and the branch drain are constructed wholly on private property, and it was admitted that the branch drain was a "single private drain" within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. Held, that the main or common drain running at the rear of J.'s houses was a sewer and was not a "single private drain" within sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act of 1890. Wimbledon Urban District Council, resps.)	417	Justices—Abatement of nuisance—Order made by three justices—Order signed by one justice only—Validity of order—Necessity of signature by two justices.—By sect. 251 of the Public Health Act 1875 a court of summary jurisdiction when hearing

Sewer or drain—"Single private drain."—T. was the owner of a block of seven houses in a street, and adjacent to these were two blocks of six houses each, belonging to another owner. There were two private passages between the blocks leading to the backs of the houses. A 6in. pipe passed through the two blocks and across the two passages, passing into a 9in. pipe passing through the block belonging to T., and out into the main sewer in a street running at right angles to the street in which the three blocks were situated. Street not repairable by inhabitants at large—Expenses of sewerage and paving—Liability of owners of premises—Owner at date of completion of work not owner at date of demand—Liability of person not owner at date of demand.—Under sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, notices were served by an urban authority upon the owners of premises fronting or abutting on a street (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) to sewer, pave, and make up the street. These notices not having been complied with, the urban authority executed the necessary works and apportioned the expenses upon the owners of premises fronting on the street. The appellant, both at the time of the notice to pave and at the time of the completion of the works by the urban authority, was the owner of premises fronting the street; but before the date of the notice of apportionment and of the demand upon him to pay the amount apportioned on his premises, he had ceased to be owner, having sold the premises, and upon the date of the demand of such amount he was not owner of the premises. Upon summary proceedings before justices to recover the amount apportioned on the premises, from the appellant as being the "owner in default" within the meaning of sect. 150: Held, but only upon the authority of the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (40 L. T. Rep. 424; 4 Q. B. Div. 305), that, notwithstanding the words in sect. 257 of the Act that such expenses may be recovered by the local authority "from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed," the appellant not having been the owner at the date of the demand upon him to pay the apportioned amount, was not the "owner in default" within the meaning of sect. 150, although he was the owner of the premises at the time when the works were completed, and that therefore he was not liable to pay the expenses. To be the "owner in default" in such cases, a person must be the owner not only at the time when the works are completed, but also at the time when the apportioned amount is demanded from him. Unsound meat—Meat going bad while stored—Meat not set out or offered for sale—"Intended for the food of man."—On a Monday morning, shortly after twelve o'clock at noon, an inspector of nuisances visited the shop where the appellant carried on the business of a butcher. The shop contained a safe which the inspector found closed. It was opened by him and found to contain some meat which showed signs of decomposition. Business was carried on at the appellant's shop up to midnight on the previous Saturday, when all the meat remaining unsold was placed in the safe, and was then sound and fit for the food of man. On the Monday in question the safe had not been opened after midnight on the previous Saturday until the inspector's visit, a period of thirty-six hours. In the ordinary course of the appellant's business all the meat contained in the safe would have been examined before setting		RAILWAY.
		Carriage of goods—Owner's risk—Over-carriage by mistake—Goods forwarded by another route to reduce damage—Liability of railway company.—Barrels of fish were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants to be carried to J. rid S. upon the condition that the defendants were to be relieved from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention. At E., instead of transferring the barrels to another truck to go to S., owing to a mistake they were carried on to T. It being too late to return the barrels to E. and send them rid S. to J., the defendants, to save further delay, sent them rid W. Owing to this there was a delay in the delivery, and the fish was damaged. Held, that the defendants were not liable. (Foster v. Great Western Railway Company.)	779
		Rates—Carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train—Absence of statutory duty to carry—Right of company to impose its own terms—Inclusive charge for collection, carriage, and delivery—Equality clause.—A railway company which is under no statutory obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train is entitled to demand from all persons who wish to send non-perishable goods by passenger train a single rate including collection, carriage, and delivery. 		Rates—Undue preference—Shipment rate and works rate—Works rate for same services higher than shipment rate—Right of trader to apply for reduction of works rate—Right to make application where trader does not directly pay rate.—The mere fact that a railway company charge a higher rate for carriage of coal over the same length of line to traders' works—all traders being charged an equal rate—than they do for coal for shipment, is not of itself sufficient to give a trader a right to apply to the court for reduction of the works rate, and such difference between the works rate and the shipment rate does not necessarily show an undue preference or an undue prejudice within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts. A railway company carried from certain collieries to C. large quantities of coal, the greater proportion of which was for shipment from that port to places abroad and to ports in England, and the remaining part was for works in C., including the works of the applicants, who were large flour millers in C., and for home consumption. They carried the shipment coal at a low shipment rate, but all other coal, whether for works (including the applicants' works) or for home consumption, was charged a higher or works rate, the works rate being some 50 per cent. higher than the shipment rate, and being the same for all traders in C. It was proved that the low shipment rate was justified by necessity, and that owing to competition with other ports and to other causes it was practically impossible in the interests of the public for the company to raise the shipment rate; and further, that the works rate was a reasonable rate, and was in fact so low that it could not reasonably be made lower without reducing it to a non-paying rate, and though there was some slight competition, no real or substantial competition was proved between the two classes of coal. Upon a complaint by the applicants that the higher works rate charged for the carriage of their coal as compared with the low shipment rate was an undue preference and an undue prejudice within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts: Held, that the mere difference in the two rates was not in itself sufficient to prove an undue preference or an undue prejudice, or to give the applicants a right to come to the court for relief; that, under the circumstances, within the meaning of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 27 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888, not only was the lower charge for the shipment traffic "necessary for securing in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made," but also "the inequality could not be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant," and that therefore the applicants were not entitled to a reduction in the works rate charged to them. Scoble, in such case, the fact that the rates are charged by the railway company to and paid by the colliery company, and not directly charged to or paid by a trader himself in the first instance, does not prevent the trader from applying to the court under the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, if in substance the charge is made so as to affect the traders' interest. Poor rate—Appeal against assessment—Appearance of assessment committee as respondents—Consent of guardians—Notice to guardians.—Sect. 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864 provides that the assessment committee of a union may, with the consent of the guardians of such union, after notice shall have been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to an appeal to quarter sessions against a poor rate. Sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1882 provides that where under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union is required, a fourteen days' notice shall be given to each guardian of the meeting at which the resolution giving the consent is passed. Held, that sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 does not have reference to sect. 2 of the Act of 1864, and therefore it is not a condition precedent to the power of the guardians to give their consent under sect. 2 of the Act of 1864 that a fourteen days' notice should be given of the meeting at which such consent is given. Volunteer drill hall and storehouse—Part occasionally let for other purposes—Exemption from rates—Crown premises.—Certain premises were used as a storehouse, drill hall, &c., for a volunteer battalion, the whole of the property being in the occupation of, and vested in, the commanding officer. Certain portions of the premises were occasionally let for lectures, balls, &c., but such letting was subservient to the use of the premises for military purposes. The appellant was the caretaker, and did not reside on the premises, but the musical and dramatic licences were taken out in the name of the appellant. The appellant was rated in respect of such portions of the premises as were let out for the above-mentioned purposes. Held, that, although the appellant was not the proper person to be rated, as he was only a servant, yet those portions of the premises which were let out were properly rateable. (*Lewis, app. v. Estate duty—Gift inter vivos—Death of donor within twelve months—Release of donor from prior covenant for payment of gift after death—Liability of gift to estate duty.—In 1892 a person covenanted with trustees that within three months after her death her executors should pay the sum of £5000, free of all duties and deductions, to the trustees upon trust for a certain charity. Some eight years afterwards, the donor, with the object of giving the sum in her lifetime, executed another deed by which she covenanted to pay the £5000 at once, and by this deed she, her executors and estate, were relieved from payment of the £5000 under the former deed. The £5000 was paid over, and the donor died within twelve months from the execution of the deed and the payment. Upon her death the Crown claimed estate duty upon this sum of £5000. Held, that the payment of the £5000 was "an immediate gift inter vivos," within the meaning of sect. 38, sub-sect. 2 (a), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881; that it was none the less a gift because there was a release of the donor and her estate from the obligation under the prior deed, and that, as the

- Estate duty—Mortgage by tenant for life and remainderman—Indemnity to tenant for life—Property passing on death of tenant for life.—The tenant for life of settled lands joined with the remainderman in creating a mortgage on the lands. The loan secured by the mortgage was entirely for the benefit of the remainderman, and the tenant for life did not covenant to pay either the mortgage debt or the interest on it. By an indenture of even date with the mortgage, and made between the remainderman and the tenant for life, the former covenanted to indemnify the latter against any loss of profits of the settled lands, and against any expenses or charges in respect of the mortgage, and assigned certain securities and charges on other lands as security for the performance of such covenants. The tenant for life was in fact kept wholly indemnified during her life. Held, that on the death of the tenant for life the estate duty should be assessed upon the whole value of the settled lands, and not upon the value after deducting the amount of the mortgage debt. - Estate duty—Settlement estate duty—Precatory trust—Letter with wishes of testator.—N. C., by his will dated the 13th Dec. 1901, devised and bequeathed all his estate and effects of every description to his brother, C. T. C., absolutely, and he appointed his said brother, H. J. M., and C. G. executors and trustees of his will. On the 11th Jan. 1902 N. C. signed a document or letter (which has not been admitted to probate) which was headed: "Instructions to my executors Crawford, Morgan, and Gasquet.—Dear Brother Crawford (I dictated this to Gasquet).—Like many others who have gone before me, I have failed to make provision for the distribution of my property amongst my relatives and friends before it became too late to do it with care. For this reason I have left all my estate to you in the fullest reliance that you will, as far as possible and to the uttermost, carry out any wish that I may express in writing now or later, or which may be conveyed to you verbally by Gasquet or my good-hearted cousin Henry. I have made a settlement on P. D. which should suffice for him in the struggle of life which we all have to face. As regards our family, you will be the best judge how and when a suitable distribution should be made. I do not fetter your discretion in any way. You are an old man, and therefore do not delay the distribution." And then followed directions as to the disposal of certain property and amounts to be paid to certain persons. The document concluded: "Finally, these are the instructions referred to in my will. They are not in any way to fetter Crawford, and may probably be added to if I am spared, or I may carry some out in my own lifetime." A copy of this document was sent to C. T. C., who, on the 14th Jan. 1902, wrote to C. G. a letter in which he said: "All I wish to say now is that every wish expressed by my brother shall be carried out to the very fullest extent so far as I am concerned, and as far as all we three executors are concerned, for his wishes are sacred, every word." The effect of this letter was communicated to N. C. N. C. died on the 18th Feb. 1902, and his will was proved by all the executors, and estate duty and legacy duty was paid on his estate, including sums given or settled by the testator within twelve months of his death. C. T. C. took possession as beneficial owner of the residuary personal estate and of the freehold and leasehold estate of N. C., and he made on the 13th May 1902 (within twelve months next before his death) a settlement of 5000*l.* on each of his four nephews and niece. C. T. C. also gave and paid other sums to various persons in accordance with the instructions in the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902. C. T. C. died on the 13th Dec. 1902. Held, that no trust was created, and that the settlement of 5000*l.* so made was a gift made by C. T. C. within twelve months of his death, and so estate duty and settlement estate duty were payable in respect thereof. (Attorney-General v. Chamberlain and others.) ... 581

Held, that, as to the duty in respect of the sale of certain timber, the provision of the will was applicable to duty payable in respect of a succession on the death of the testator, which duty was payable out of his residuary estate. Held, also, that, as to certain heirlooms of national interest, the duty did not become payable upon the death of the testator, and would not until the happening of the event mentioned in sect. 20 of the Finance Act 1896. - Income tax—Banking company—Purchase of business of another bank—"Succession."—A banking company with many branches, and having its head office in London, in Feb. 1899 purchased for 225,000*l.*, as from the 31st Dec. 1898, the premises, business, and assets of the S. Bank, which carried on business at W. only. The business of the S. Bank was carried on as usual until the evening of the 5th March 1899, when the premises were closed. On the following morning the same premises were opened by the company as their branch at W., the whole of the staff of the S. Bank being taken over, and business was thenceforward carried on there by the company. The accounts and profits of this branch were merged in and formed part of the general accounts and profits of the company which were dealt with at the head office. For each of the three years subsequent to 1898 assessments to income tax were made upon the company on their own returns based on the average profits of their whole business for the three years preceding the year of assessment. Additional assessments for each of the three years subsequent to 1898 were made upon the company on assumed profits of their branch at W., based upon the average profits of the S. Bank for the three years before the sale to the company, upon the ground that the company had "succeeded" to the business of the S. Bank, within the 4th rule applicable to the first and second cases in sched. D to sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act 1842. Held, that the company had "succeeded" to the business of the S. Bank, and were therefore liable to the additional assessments. (Bell v. National Provincial Bank of England.) ... 2

of lands with mining possibilities, or the obtaining of options over such lands with the view to the formation and flotation of companies for the purpose of working the same and the making of a market for the shares. The profits made by the appellant company were directly obtained (inter alia) by the sale and realisation of shares in subsidiary companies. The bulk of the company's capital was invested in South African shares and in mining properties in South Africa. The evidence produced showed that with regard to the purchase and sale of shares by the company, 56½ per cent. of the purchases of shares, and 49 per cent. of the sale of shares by the company were carried out in London during the year in question. The first general meeting of the company was held in April 1899 in Johannesburg. The second general meeting was held in London in June 1901, subsequent to the year of assessment. With regard to the directors' meetings, the directors' minute-book kept in London, which was the only minute-book of the company, was produced and showed that almost every transaction of importance affecting the management, control, and direction of the company was dealt with, controlled, and decided at the board meetings of the directors in London. A considerable number of important matters requiring local management were carried out by the managing director in Johannesburg on behalf of the board under powers delegated by the board in London. A copy of the minutes of the board meetings in London were forwarded after each meeting to Johannesburg. With regard to the staff, the chairman and three of the nine directors were resident in England. The directors held monthly meetings at the company's office in London. Only one meeting was held out of England. The accounts of the Johannesburg, Paris, and Berlin offices were brought to London, where the balance-sheets and accounts of the company were made up and audited. The dividends were fixed and authorised by resolutions of the directors at meetings held in London for that purpose, and the dividend warrants in respect of certain registered shares were also issued in London. Held, that the appellant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom and liable as such to be assessed under sect. 2 of the Income Tax Act 1853, sched. D. (A. Goers and Co. He also made himself personally liable to repay these advances. The company gave him a receipt for the whole amount of the premium in each year. Held, that, in making his return of profits and gains liable to income tax, he was only entitled to deduct, under sect. 54 of the Income Tax Act 1853, that half of the nominal premium which was actually paid by him to the company. The whole of these increases were not to be paid to the masters, but were to be accumulated at compound interest to form the fund. Materials for ship in course of construction— Bankruptcy of shipbuilder—Property in goods.— A firm of shipbuilders contracted to build a ship for the respondents, to be classed 100 A 1 at Lloyd's, and built under their superintendence. The contract contained a clause to the effect that "The vessel as she is constructed, and all her engines, boilers, and machinery, and all mate- rials from time to time intended for her or them, whether in the building yard, workshop, river, or elsewhere, shall immediately as the same proceeds become the property of the purchasers, and shall not be within the ownership, control, or disposition of the builders, but the builders shall at all times have a lien thereon for their unpaid purchase money." The contract further provided that in default of delivery it should be competent for the owners to take possession of the vessel, and of all materials intended for her, and to complete her themselves. Before the vessel was completed the shipbuilders became bankrupt. At the date of the bankruptcy there was in the shipbuilding yard a quantity of plates intended for use in the construction of the ship. They had been passed by Lloyd's surveyor at the makers' works, and had been marked with the number of the ship for which they were intended, and with the position which they were to occupy in her. They had been seen in the shipbuilding yard by the shipowners so marked, but had not been specially inspected or approved by them. Held, that the case was governed by the decision in Seath v. Moore (54 L. T. Rep. 690; 11 App. Cas. 350), and was not affected by the Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), and that the trustee in the bankruptcy was entitled to the plates as against the shipowners. SETTLED LAND.		Bill of lading—Construction—Bulk cargo—Un- divided portions of bulk—"Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of damage"—Error in appor- tioning—Short delivery.—Bills of lading for un- divided portions of a bulk cargo of grain con- tained the following clause and note in margin: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any:" "Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." By an error in appor- tioning damaged grain, one consignee received a full consignment of sound grain. One of the other consignees, refusing to accept more than his proportionate share of damaged grain, received a consignment which was 108 quarters short. Held, in an action for short delivery, that the error was caused by the consignees' agents, and that the clause in the bills of lading cast no duty on the shipowner to apportion the good and un- sound grain. (Grange and Co. v. Taylor.)	486
Settled Land Acts—Sale by tenant for life—Under- value—Action by remainderman to set aside sale. —The mere fact that, upon a sale by a tenant for life under the powers of the Settled Land Acts, the purchase is at an undervalue is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the sale. In 1902 a tenant for life, purporting to act under the powers con- ferred upon him by the Settled Land Acts, sold the freehold of certain public-house property to W. for the sum of 2000l. At the time of the sale the property was subject to a lease which had been granted as from Christmas 1892 for a term of twenty-one years at a rent of 63l. per annum. Within a few days after the sale W. contracted to resell the property for 3000l., although it was doubtful whether 3000l. was not in excess of the true value of the property. W. had not, before making the original purchase, made any inquiry as to whether the trustees or tenant for life had had any valuation made. Held, that these		Bill of lading—Construction—Exceptions—Damage to goods—Unseaworthiness—Liability of ship- owner.—Frozen meat was shipped on a steamer under a bill of lading, which contained two clauses relating to exceptions. The first clause, printed in Roman type, provided: "Neither the ship nor her owners shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any cause whatsoever, whether existing at the commence- ment of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not." The second clause, printed in small italics, provided: "The act of God . . . and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz. . . . or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull . . . or otherwise (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded or the commencement of the voyage) . . . if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." The vessel, being tainted with carbolic acid, was not in a fit condition to carry the meat when it was shipped, and the meat was

- thereby damaged during the voyage. If reasonable care had been taken to cleanse the ship before the meat was shipped the damage would not have occurred. Held, that, reading the two clauses together, the shipowner was not exempted from liability for damage caused by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel. (Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Company.) ... 187
- Bill of lading—Discharge of cargo—Goods to be taken "as fast as steamer can deliver"—Deficiency of railway waggons—Option of shipowner to discharge in other ways not exercised.—Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which provided: "The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival, and as fast as steamer can deliver, or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of such goods." On arrival of the vessel the consignees neither took delivery nor did the master exercise his option of landing or lightering the goods. In an action by the charterers against the consignees for damages for detention of the vessel: Held, that the plaintiffs were not deprived of their remedy because the master had not exercised his option as to landing or lightering the goods, and were entitled to recover. Held, further, that the plaintiffs having made out a prima facie case of delay in taking delivery by the defendants, the onus was upon the defendants to show that the delay arose from no default on their part, and was due to the want of appliances in the port, and that they had failed to do so. (The Arne.) ... 517
- Bill of lading—Liberty to over-carry goods if discharge cannot be effected without undue detention—Discharge prevented by delay at previous port—Delay caused by negligence of shipowner's agent—Remoteness of damage—Liability of shipowner.—A bill of lading contained the following clause: "If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns." The ship was delayed at a port of call in the course of her voyage by the negligence of the shipowner's agents, with the result that, on her arrival at the port where the goods were to be discharged, the master found that the discharge could not be effected without undue detention, and he therefore over-carried the goods to London. In an action by the consignees to recover damages for the over-carriage of the goods: Held, that the damage was not so remote from the negligence of the shipowner's agents as to disentitle the consignees from succeeding in the action. (Searle v. Lund.) ... 529
- Charter-party—Construction—Time for loading—Stoppage by strike—"Stoppage for six days from time of vessel being ready to coal"—Right to cancel charter.—By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship of the appellants should load a cargo of coal for the charterers "to be loaded in 140 running hours, commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds, and ready to load." The charter-party also provided that in the event of a stoppage caused by a strike "continuing for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage." Due notice was given that the ship was ready to load, and, after the expiration of the time allowed for loading, a stoppage caused by a strike commenced, and continued for six days. No cargo had been shipped, and the charterers gave notice that the charter-party was cancelled. Held, that the charter-party contemplated a stoppage in existence at the beginning of the loading time, and that the charterers were not entitled to cancel the charter on the occurrence of a stoppage at a later period. (Steel, Young, and Co. v. Grand Canary Coaling Company.) ... 720
- Charter-party—Detention at port—Loading—"Regular turn"—Custom of port—Delay caused by number of vessels chartered—Option.—A charter-party provided that a sailing vessel was to load a cargo of coal at N. "in regular turn" from B. Colliery or any of the collieries the freighters might name. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted. When the vessel arrived, a great many vessels were waiting to load from B. Colliery, and in consequence sixty-seven days elapsed before a coaling order could be given to the vessel. The charterers, who were the owners of B. Colliery, had sold a cargo of that coal to be shipped by this vessel. Held, that the words "regular turn" referred to the colliery turn as distinguished from the port turn both upon their proper construction and also having regard to the regulations and practice of the port. Held, also, that the defendants had not chartered an unreasonable number of vessels to arrive at the port about the same time so as to make it impossible that the vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and that the probability of delay was known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party. Held, therefore, that the charterers had not acted unreasonably, and were not liable for the detention of the vessel. (Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown.) ... 765
- Charter-party—Freight at per ton shipped payable on right delivery—Lump sum freight—Loss of part of cargo by jettison—Payment by consignees of bill of lading freight—Rights of charterers against shipowners.—By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship was to load at Fiume a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and therewith proceed to Boston and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash; charterers' liability to cease when cargo was shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in the charter had been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight as presented, without prejudice or reference to the charter, any difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight to be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master. The charterers had previously agreed with an American company at Boston to ship by the vessel named in the charter-party a cargo of sugar in bags from Fiume to Boston at 10s. per ton. On the vessel being loaded, the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—i.e., 6d. per ton—was paid, and bills of lading were signed. In the course of the voyage the vessel went aground and part of the cargo was jettisoned. On the arrival of the vessel the remainder of the cargo was delivered, and the consignees thereupon paid to the shipowners the bill of lading freight payable on the gross weight shipped. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover so much of the freight paid by the consignees to the shipowners as represented the freight upon the cargo which was not delivered: Held (by Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Collins, M.R., Romer, L.J. dissenting), that the charterers were entitled to recover the sum claimed. (London Transport Company Limited v. Trechmann Brothers.) ... 132
- Charter-party—Hire—Suspension of hire—Detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer"—Vessel detained owing to repairs made necessary by stranding.—By a charter-party it was provided by one clause that, in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel, the payment of hire should cease until she should again be in an efficient state to resume her service, and by another clause that "detention by ice should be for account of charterers, unless caused by breakdown of steamer." During the voyage the vessel stranded;

- the necessary repairs were effected, and she resumed her voyage; owing, however, to the delay thus caused, she was unable to proceed to the destined port before it was closed by ice, and she was consequently detained at an intermediate port. Held, that there was a detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer," and that payment of hire ceased during that detention. (Re Arbitration between C. Trane, for the Owners of the Steamship Rikard Nordraak, and Lennard and Sons Limited.) ... 407
- Charter-party—Obligation of charterer to have cargo ready—No time fixed for loading—Cargo from specific source—Option of charterer—Knowledge of parties at time of contract.—A sailing ship was chartered to load at N. a "cargo of coals as ordered by the charterers," and they afterwards directed that it should be loaded with coal from W. Colliery. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted. The W. Colliery had a small output, and the coal was in great demand. These facts were known to the parties at the time of the contract. In consequence of the number of ships loading from W. Colliery, the ship did not obtain a loading berth for a long time, and, in addition to being delayed at N., lost a charter-party elsewhere, as she did not arrive before the cancelling date. The owners brought an action to recover damages for the loss thus occasioned to them. Held, that the charterers were not bound to have a cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship; that the vessel obtained a loading order in due course in her colliery turn and there was then no delay on the part of the charterers, and therefore the cargo was provided within a reasonable time; that the option to select the particular coal was an option for the benefit of the charterers, who were not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the shipowners; and therefore, all parties being acquainted with the practice at the port and the charterers having acted reasonably, they were not liable for the delay. (Jones Limited v. Green and Co.) ... 768
- Collision—Both to blame—Damages—Payment by cargo owners to shipowners—Right of cargo owner to recover money so paid from wrong-doing vessel—Registrar and merchants.—A collision occurred between the steamship U. and the steamship M., for which both vessels were found to blame. The U. had on board at the time a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty, and, in order to avoid probable expense, an agreement was come to by which the owners of the U. waived their right to carry the cargo to its destination, and the coals were discharged and sold. The owners of the U. recovered against the owners of the M. a moiety of their damages. A claim was made by the Admiralty, as owners of the cargo on board the U., against the owners of the M. for their proportion of the sum paid to the owners of the U. Held, that they were not entitled to recover anything, as such a payment could not be said to be the natural result of the collision, and that, if the owners of the M. were liable, the sum recovered would be payable to the owners of the U., who had already been paid a moiety of all the losses they had incurred by reason of the collision. (The Minnetonka.) ... 354
- Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Port of Liverpool—Vessel proceeding through the port to Manchester.—Pilotage is compulsory on a vessel inward bound from the sea through the port of Liverpool to Manchester until she enters the Ship Canal at Eastham. Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 requires that "the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool." The fact that a vessel anchors for the purpose of waiting for the tide does not put an end to the compulsory services of the pilot. Seemle, pilotage is also compulsory on vessels going out from Eastham through the port of Liverpool to the sea. (The Mercedes de Larrinaga.) ... 520
- Collision—Failure to stand by and give name—Compulsory pilotage—Limits of port of Liverpool.—The fact of a vessel after collision with another vessel not standing by and giving her name, as required by sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, does not render her owners liable, if at the time she was compulsorily in charge of a pilot. A collision occurred in the estuary of the river Mersey between the steamships G. and S. By sect. 127 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, "every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel so far to the westward as the ... Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel." Since the date of the Act the buoy has been removed, and for the purposes of pilotage the Bar Lightship, which occupies a position outside of that occupied by the buoy, is treated as the westward limit. The G. at the time of the collision was at anchor between the Bar Lightship and the place where the buoy used to be. The defendants pleaded that the S. was at the time of the collision compulsorily in charge of a pilot. Held, that, the Fairway Buoy having been removed, the Bar Lightship occupied the same place relatively for the purposes of sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, and that pilotage was therefore compulsory. (The Sussex.) ... 540
- Collision—Manchester Ship Canal—Fog—Application of sea rules—Duty to stop and reverse on hearing whistle of approaching vessel.—Seemle, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. Even assuming that they do apply, a vessel coming down the canal in a fog is not necessarily to blame under art. 16 of the regulations if she does not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of an approaching vessel forward of her beam; for the approaching vessel must be in the canal, and it may be assumed that she is being navigated on her right side, and her position is therefore, under the circumstances, sufficiently ascertained. (The Hare.) ... 323
- Collision—River Mersey—Vessel coming out of dock—Duty to keep out of the way.—A steamship coming out of Prince's Dock into the river Mersey came into collision with another steamship coming down the east side of the river in tow of two tugs. Held, that art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea did not apply, and that there was no duty on the down-coming vessel to keep out of the way. (The Sunlight.) ... 32
- Collision—Vessel "not under command"—Duty to keep course.—A vessel exhibiting two red lights under art. 4 (a) of the Collision Regulations as a signal that she is "not under command" ought to keep her course when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision. A collision occurred between the brigantine R. and the barque H. The R. was at the time close-hauled on the starboard tack; the H. was sailing free, but, having been recently in collision with a steamship, was exhibiting "not under command" lights. The helm of the R. was put up in order to pass ahead of the H., while the helm of the H. was ported. Held, that the H. ought to have kept her course and let the R. get out of her way. (The Hawthornbank.) ... 293
- Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Exceptions—Marginal clause.—The plaintiffs were indorsees of bills of lading under which a cargo of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat was shipped on the defendants' steamship. By the bills of lading it was provided that "the ... owners ... shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating ... or consequences arising therefrom ... or heat. That the ... owners ... shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned

... whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned ... or occasioned by any act or omission, negligence, default of stevedores ... or other persons in the service of the shipowners ... On the margin of the bills of lading under which the maize was shipped was stamped: "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage occurring to the within mentioned goods." Part of the maize became heated on the voyage, and the other cargo was damaged through improper stowage. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages: Held, that the words "above mentioned" did not refer to the matters in the clause above or the marginal clause, and that the word "heat" referred to heat arising from some extraneous cause, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. Held, further, that if the owners desired to relieve themselves from liability for the negligence of their own servants there should have been express words. (The Pearlmoor.) ... 319

Damage to pier by ship—Action by owner of pier—County Court jurisdiction—Writ of prohibition.—By sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 it is provided that County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction as to any claim for "damage by collision." The plaintiff was the owner of a pier, and brought an action in the County Court against the defendants for damage done by their vessel to his pier. The defendants moved for a writ of prohibition. Held, that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, for the County Court judge to determine the action, and that a writ of prohibition must therefore go. (The Normandy.) ... 351

Pilotage—Port of Bristol—Compulsory pilot—Vessel bound from Newport to Bristol—Vessel in Newport pilotage district, but within port of Bristol—Necessity of Bristol pilot.—By the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 it was provided in sect. 9 that all vessels navigating or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, should be piloted and navigated by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation. By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 it was provided in sect. 4 that so much of the 9th section of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester should be repealed, and by the same Act pilotage boards and pilotage districts—which in some cases overlapped the port of Bristol—were created for the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and power was given to these boards to license pilots for their districts. By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 it was provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, a vessel navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation, except when within the limits of that port, which were therein defined. Held, that the Act of 1861 was not intended to deal with and did not deal with or include vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, although such vessels were bound from or to one of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and that therefore in the case of a vessel which is not exempt from compulsory pilotage in the port of Bristol there is still the obligation under the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 to have a compulsory pilot licensed by the corporation of Bristol when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port, although the vessel may be bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and may still be within one of those three pilotage districts which overlaps the port of Bristol. Consequently, when a vessel on the voyage puts into Newport, and then proceeds from Newport with a Newport pilot on board to the port of Bristol, as soon as the vessel gets within the limits of the port of Bristol the Newport pilot is bound to give up the charge of the vessel to a Bristol pilot demanding such charge, although the vessel is still within the Newport pilotage district, and within the district for which the Newport pilot is licensed. (Reed, app. v. Goldsworthy, resp.) ... 126

Salvage—Stranding of salved vessel—Value for purposes of award.—A steam trawler towed a disabled steamship into Aberdeen Bay, and signals were made for a pilot and a tug. A tug came up in response and offered to pilot and tow the vessel into harbour, but the offer was refused by her master, and the tug sent back for a pilot. In the meanwhile the hawser parted, and the vessel drifted ashore. Her value at the time the services of the tug were offered was 8500*l.* The costs of refloating were 1150*l.*, and of the repairs in consequence of the stranding 5600*l.* In an action for salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the trawler: Held, on the facts, that they were entitled to salvage, and to an award of 750*l.*, and that, for the purposes of arriving at a proper award, the value of the salved property must be taken at 8500*l.* Held, further, that the steamship ought to have taken the services of the tug when offered. Seaman—"Distressed seaman"—Provisions for relief—Evidence of distress—Receipt of wages by seaman.—The question whether a seaman who has been shipwrecked abroad is a "distressed seaman" within the meaning of sects. 190, 191, and 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is a question of fact. A "distressed seaman" does not of necessity cease to be a "distressed seaman" on his being paid the wages due to him, when such wages are enough to pay the expenses of his maintenance abroad and passage home. Quære, whether the "sufficient evidence" of expenses incurred for his benefit which is provided for by sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, means "conclusive evidence." Costs—Taxation—Commission—Collection of rents—Professional work—Professional charges—Items of professional charges in bill of costs.—The solicitors acting for the executors and trustees of the deceased owner of settled real estates charged with legacies and duties which his personality was insufficient to satisfy, having been accustomed to collect and receive the rents for him at an agreed charge until his death on the 7th April 1901, continued to collect and receive the rents for the executors and trustees without making any agreement as to their remuneration for so doing up to the 25th March 1902, when the succeeding tenant for life assumed the management of the estates, and in their bill of costs delivered to the executors and trustees inserted a charge of a lump sum, being a commission of 5 per cent. on the amount of the rents collected, as their remuneration for the work; but did not set out the items of that work as in the case of charges for strictly professional duties. The succeeding tenant for life obtained an order for taxation of the solicitors' bill of costs, and the taxing master on taxation allowed the charge of a lump sum by way of commission for collecting the rents, and overruled the objections of the tenant for life to that allowance. a review of the taxation: Held, that, if the charge was a charge for professional work, the solicitors ought to have delivered a bill of items in respect of it, and that, in the absence of any agreement to that effect, the taxing master was not entitled to allow the solicitors a lump sum by way of commission for it, while, on the other hand, if collecting rents was not professional work, the charge for it ought not to have been inserted in the solicitors' bill of costs; and that the proper order was to direct the master to treat the charge as struck out of the bill of costs. Covenant in articles of clerkship not to practise within certain radius—Breach—Work usually done by solicitors.—The defendant had bound himself to a solicitor practising at M. by articles for a term, and covenanted that he would not at any time do any work or act for or on behalf of any persons usually done by solicitors within a radius of fifteen miles from M. without written permission. The defendant took proceedings to obtain probate of the will of a person within the prohibited radius, and corresponded from H. with a witness within the prohibited radius with a view to obtaining his evidence in order to enable probate to be obtained. He signed the præcipe directing a plaint note to be issued for a County Court summons at a court in the prohibited area on behalf of a plaintiff residing therein, and conducted the proceedings until receipt of the amount paid into court. He prepared the will of a testatrix residing within the area on instructions received outside the area, and received a small fee therefor, but was present when she executed it within the area; and, lastly, he advertised in a paper circulating within but published outside the area a farm for letting within the prohibited district. Held, in an action to restrain the defendant from practising within the prohibited limit, that the covenant might be broken although the defendant or his clerks did not go professionally within such limit. That therefore the proceedings in connection with the collection of the debt through the County Court infringed the covenant. Also the acts done in relation to the execution of the will, which must be held to have been done by the defendant in his character of a solicitor, constituted a breach of such covenant, but that those as to advertising the farm did not break it. Quare , as to applying for the proof of evidence infringing the covenant. society—Action by member to enforce benefit rules.—A society registered under the Trade Union Acts was governed by rules, some of which made provision for benefits to members, and the others were illegal as being in restraint of trade. A member brought an action against the officers of the society to enforce a rule of the society under which he claimed to be entitled to a superannuation allowance. Held, upon the consideration of all the rules of the society, that the main object of the society was illegal at common law as being in restraint of trade, and that those rules which made provision for benefits to members were merely ancillary to that main object, and could not be separated from it. Held, therefore, that under sect. 4 of the Trade Union Act 1871 the action must fail. (Cullen v. Elwin and others.) ... 840

Purchase by local authority—Depot outside district of local authority—"Used with and suitable to" the undertaking—Liability of local authority to pay for.—By sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 it is provided: "Where the promoters of a tramway in a district are not the local authority, the local authority . . . may" (within certain specified times) " . . . by notice in writing require such promoters to sell, and thereupon such promoters shall sell to them their undertaking, or so much of the same as is within such district, upon terms of paying the then value . . . of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district." The tramway company was the owner of a large depot situated some distance outside the boundary of the district council, but found by an arbitrator to be "used with and suitable to" the undertaking of the tramway company within the council's district. The district council having given notice to the tramway company that they were required to sell to the council under the conditions and in the manner provided by sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 so much of their works and undertaking as were within the council's district: Held, that the council were bound to pay for this depot. Held, further, that the words "within such district" applied to the "undertaking," and not to "all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters." Ditch and fence—Presumption of ownership—Acts of ownership—Rebuttal of presumption.—The plaintiff and defendant were adjoining owners of land, the lands being bounded by a bank with a fence, with a ditch on the defendant's side. For nearly fifty years the defendant had trimmed the fence, pollarded the trees, and cleansed the ditch, but there was no evidence of knowledge on the part of the plaintiff. Held, that these acts of ownership did not rebut the presumption that the bank and fence were the property of the plaintiff. (Henniker v. Howard.) ... 157

Statutory right to erect post "in, over, or under any street"—Erection of electric post—Taking of land.—By sect. 51 of the Newport Corporation Act 1900, with which the Lands Clauses Act 1845 was incorporated, the corporation might, for the purpose of working their tramways, construct and erect "on, in, over, or under any street or road" poles and posts. For the purpose of working their tramways the corporation erected an iron pillar, about 10in. in diameter, upon the plaintiff's land, which by dedication, subject to a user by the plaintiff, formed part of the street, such pillar being sunk about 6ft. in the ground. Held, that this was not a "taking of land" within the Lands Clauses Act, but was an exercise of the statutory powers of the defendants under their private Act. (Escott v. Mayor, &c., of Newport.) ... 348

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Goodwill—Sale of business with goodwill—Vendor interested in new business—Solicitation of old customers who have also become customers of the new business.—The vendor of an interest in a business which with the goodwill thereof had been sold by him to a company solicited on behalf of a competing business in which he was interested customers of the old business, who were also customers of the competing business. Held, that the vendor must be restrained by injunction from soliciting the customers of the business which he had sold, whether or not such customers were also customers of the competing business. Outgoings—Paving and making up roadway—Charge on frontager's premises—Date from which charge takes effect—"Completion of works."—Expenses incurred by a local authority under the Public Health Act 1875 in the execution of works required to be done under sect. 150 become "a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred" within the meaning of sect. 257 as soon as the works have been completed. Power of sale—Will—Executor—Constructive trustee.—A testatrix by her will dated the 3rd March 1849 appointed R. J. and U. M. executors, and gave them powers to apply income in maintenance and to sell certain hereditaments after the death of the survivors of her daughters. The testatrix died on the 25th Dec. 1850. R. J. alone proved the will and died, leaving J. W. and M. W. his executors. In 1873 a petition was presented by all parties beneficially interested, and new trustees of the will were appointed under the Trustee Act 1850. After the death of the survivor of the daughters the trustees contracted to sell the hereditaments. The purchaser required the concurrence of the beneficiaries. Held, that the concurrence of the beneficiaries could not be required. (Re Perrott and King's Contract.) ... 156

Sale by auction—Maintaining fences—Covenant—Form of conveyance to purchaser.—The object of having a deed of conveyance is not merely to vest the property the subject of it in the purchaser, but to embody covenants as to what must be done under the contract of sale after completion of the purchase. Therefore where a purchaser bought under a contract which made him liable to erect and for ever after maintain fences, as marked on the plan of property sold by public auction, the vendor was held entitled to have the obligations of the purchaser expressed in the conveyance to him of his lot. Sale of land—Purchaser's interest before completion—Judgment creditor of purchaser—Receiver by way of equitable execution—Notice to vendor—Personal estate—Date of appointment—Effect of appointment.—The appointment of a receiver upon giving security does not, as regards personal property, become effectual until security is actually given, and does not refer back to the date of the original order. G. contracted to purchase land from the defendant, paid a deposit of 300*l.*, and received immediate possession. The plaintiff subsequently became a judgment creditor of G. and obtained a receiver in respect of G.'s interest in the land. Notice of the receivership was given to the defendant. G. failed to pay the purchase money, and the defendant gave notice of rescission to G., who thereupon commenced an action for the return of the deposit. That action was settled at a date subsequent to the order appointing the receiver, but anterior to security being given. By the terms of the consent order the defendant paid G. 110*l.*, and G. agreed to give up possession. Held, that G. never acquired the ownership in equity of the land, and that consequently the receivership did not create a charge or lien. With regard to the 110*l.* paid by the defendant to G., the receiver, not having given security at the date of the payment, had not been effectually appointed, and therefore had no claim to be paid that money. Further, even if the receivership had been in force, the order appointing a receiver having failed to constitute a charge or lien, notice of the appointment did not do so; and the defendant incurred no liability by paying the money to G. direct. (Ridout v. Fowler.) 147	might then be in a position to treat his claim as shadowy. (George v. Thomas.)... .. 505

Settled land—Original settlement—Compound settlement—Life estate under original settlement extinguished—Charge for jointure and portions under original settlement—Sale by tenant for life under powers of original settlement—Trustees of original settlement.—A testator settled his land on his eldest son for life, with remainder to the son's sons in tail male in strict settlement, with power for each tenant for life on his marriage to create charges thereon for jointure for his wife and portions for his younger children. Land was purchased by the trustees of the will and added to the settled land, and the tenant for life married and charged the land subject to the settlement with jointure and portions. By successive deeds of resettlement, family arrangement, and appointment, to which the tenant for life and tenant in tail male were parties, the life estate given by the testator's will was extinguished and a compound settlement was created; but the charge for jointure and portions made under the powers given by the testator's will still subsisted. The tenant for life with the concurrence of the tenant in tail, then agreed to sell part of the settled land in exercise of his power of sale under the original settlement created by the testator's will alone, the purchase money to be paid to the trustees of the will. On a summons by the purchaser for the determination of the question whether the tenant for life could sell under the original settlement created by the will alone, or whether trustees of the compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds must be appointed: Held, that, as the charge for jointure and portions made under the powers given by the will was still subsisting, the original settlement created by the will alone was still existing side by side with the compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds, and that the tenant for life could sell under the will alone, so that it was unnecessary to appoint trustees of the compound settlement. 	Declaration by lodger claimant—Evidence—Personal attendance of claimant—Rateable value of house—Character of street.—A revising barrister by personal inspection satisfied himself that certain houses were very poor and small, and that it was very doubtful whether any lodgings in those houses were worth 10 l. a year unfurnished. J. duly sent in his claim as a lodger with his declaration attached. It was proved that the rateable value of the house, which was stated to be in as poor a street as any the revising barrister had inspected, was only 14 l. per annum, which was 6 s. less than J. claimed to pay as lodger. The revising barrister adjourned the hearing of the objection to J.'s claim, and sent him the following notice: "... your claim to vote as a lodger has been objected to ... your claim will or may be disallowed unless you produce or cause to be produced to me ... your rent-book or other sufficient evidence that your said lodgings are of the clear yearly value of 10 l. if let unfurnished." J. did not attend or make any communication, and his claim was disallowed. Held, that, as the revising barrister did not make the allowance of the claim dependent upon J.'s personal attendance, the court could not interfere, as there was evidence to support his decision. A revising barrister cannot make the personal attendance of a claimant a condition of the allowance of his vote. The right of a revising barrister to disallow a claim, when a claimant has by his declaration given prima facie evidence of his qualification, is not confined to the case of such prima facie proof of the ground of objection as is described in sect. 28 (10) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878, but he may act on other evidence. (Jenkins, app. v. Grocott, resp.) 90
Specific performance—Threat of litigation.—At a sale by auction on the 21st July 1903 the defendant contracted to buy a secured profit rental of 550 l. per annum for 5500 l. This profit rental was secured upon two houses in Cheapside, the receipts from tenants amounting to 950 l. , the ground rent being 250 l. , and the rates and taxes on one of the houses being 150 l. No deduction was made in respect of the other house, of which W. was the tenant, as there was no covenant by the landlord to pay rates and taxes. As a matter of fact the landlord had from 1876 until 1903 paid the rates and taxes on the house let to W. On the 29th Sept. 1903 W. commenced an action for rectification of his lease, but the action was dismissed because he had granted an underlease of the term vested in him which amounted to an assignment. W. wrote that he intended to take proceedings to make the underlessee join, and bring a fresh action. The plaintiff said that, the action by W. having been heard and dismissed, the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance. For the defendant it was said that the plaintiff knew W. said that he was not liable to pay rates and taxes before the sale, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance. Held, that W.'s claim was an honest one, and that specific performance could not now be granted, because sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the court to say that no fresh action would be brought. The action was ordered to stand over till the 24th June, and, if W. had then taken no steps to obtain rectification, the court	WARRANTY. (See FOOD AND DRUGS.)

	Water company—Supply of water—Communication pipe belonging to occupier—Defect in—Leakage and waste of water—Non-repair by occupier—Right to cut off water—Right of occupier to demand supply.—An owner or occupier of premises in the metropolis, whose attention is called by the waterworks company, who are bound to supply him with water, to a defect under the street in the communication pipe belonging to him and connecting his premises with the company's main, and who has the opportunity of repairing the defect without opening the roadway, but does not choose to repair it, is not a person entitled to demand a supply of water under sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847. A leak having been discovered under the roadway opposite certain premises in the metropolis, the waterworks company opened the street and found that the communication pipe connecting the premises with the company's main was defective and leaking, thereby causing a waste of water. The communication pipe was the property of the occupier, and the company at once gave him notice of the defect, stating that if it were not remedied forthwith the company would disconnect the pipe from their main, and would not allow it to be reconnected until the pipe was repaired. The occupier took no steps to repair his pipe, and it was disconnected from the main and the water cut off. The occupier could at the time have repaired the pipe without opening the street, as the street was then open. Held, that the duty of repairing the defect in the pipe was by sect. 28 of the Metropolis Water Act 1871 cast upon the owner or occupier, and that the owner or occupier who, after notice that the communication pipe belonging to him was out of repair, permitted the pipe to remain in its defective state in which it would cause waste of water, has wrongfully failed to do something for the prevention of the waste within the meaning of sect. 32, and that under the circumstances the company were entitled to cut off the water, and to cease to give a supply to the occupier so long as the pipe remained unrepaired. Water supply by corporation—Water for domestic use—"Water rate"—Right of corporation to charge at different rates—"Rate."—A municipal corporation acquired the undertaking of a waterworks company by a private Act, which authorised the corporation "to charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable." The company had statutory power to supply any person with water for any purpose for such remuneration as might be agreed under a special agreement; and the corporation succeeded to that power. The corporation charged for the supply of water for domestic use in one part of the borough 5 per cent., and in another part $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., upon the net rateable value of dwelling-houses. Held, that the corporation had power to charge at different rates, within the maximum, for the supply of water for domestic use to dwelling-houses. A provisional order provided that the general district rates to be levied in a district thereby added to the borough should not in any year for ten years exceed such an amount in the pound as, when added to the poor rate and borough rate "and any other rate made by the corporation" in the same year, would make a total rate of 5s. 6d. in the pound. Held, that the water rate was not a "rate" within the meaning of the words "any other rate" in the provisional order. (Northampton Corporation v. Waterworks—Dividends—"Prescribed rate"—Preference shares issued under special Act—Rate of interest fixed by company—Profits divisible among ordinary shareholders.—The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 enacts by sect. 75 that the profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year shall not exceed "the prescribed rate," or, where no rate is prescribed, the rate of 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital in the undertaking; and by sect. 2 "prescribed" means "prescribed for that purpose in the special Act." The Companies Clauses Act 1863 provides by sect. 13 that where a company is authorised by any special Act to raise money by the issue of new preference shares or stock, it may issue the shares or stock with a dividend or interest not exceeding the rate prescribed in the special Act, and, if no rate is prescribed, then not exceeding the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. A waterworks company whose Acts incorporated the above-mentioned enactments obtained power to raise additional capital by the issue of new preference stock, no rate of interest being named in their special Act. This stock was in fact issued, some at 5 per cent.	Waterworks—Lands compulsorily taken for reservoir—Assessment of compensation—Natural and peculiar adaptability of land for building a reservoir—Right of arbitrator to take into consideration.—In assessing compensation for land compulsorily taken by a water company for the purpose of building a reservoir thereon, the natural and peculiar adaptability of the land for building a reservoir is a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof, although there may be no evidence of any possible purchasers for that purpose besides the water company. Held, that the true test was whether the vehicle had been weighed so recently and under such circumstances that its correct weight had been ascertained. Semble , that weighing at reasonable intervals was not the proper test, but that the waggon need not be weighed before every delivery. 	WILL.

	Accumulation—39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98—Trust to pay debts—Debts paid out of capital moneys—Trust to recoup capital.—H., by his will made on the 22nd July 1881, gave certain annuities and devised and bequeathed the residue upon trust that the trustees should accumulate the rents and profits, until sufficient should be raised to pay off certain sums amounting in all to 116,000 l. , for twenty-one years from the death of the last surviving grandchild living at his death. Under the will A. was the present tenant for life, and B. was tenant in tail in remainder. The will provided that if the debts, directed to be paid out of accumulations, were paid out of capital moneys, the capital moneys should be recouped the sums so paid. Until 1903 the annuities had exhausted the whole of the income, but on the death of an annuitant there was now a surplus income of about 5000 l. per annum. One hundred thousand pounds of the debts directed to be paid out of accumulations had been paid out of the proceeds of sale of land sold under the Settled Land Acts, and 16,000 l. had been paid out of the proceeds of sale of land sold by the trustees under a power of sale contained in the will. It was submitted by A. that he was entitled to the whole income, as the trust was not one to pay debts, but to recoup capital. For B. it was said that the trust to recoup capital was in fact a trust to pay debts. Held, that, as to the 100,000 l. paid out of capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Acts, it was clear that there was no right of recoupment. As to the 16,000 l. , once debts were paid and satisfied out of capital moneys, a direction that capital should be recouped was not a direction for payment of debts. | institutions, bequeathed to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., mentioning accurately the name of its secretary and address of its office, £250. By codicil made in 1902, after reciting twice incorrectly that she had given by will £500 to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W. . . . and, amongst others, to St. M.'s Orphanage, Bayswater, £100, she revoked all the legacies, "and instead thereof" bequeathed £500 each to the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., and to St. M.'s Orphanage. The legacy of £500 was claimed by the Royal Hospital for Incurables and by the plaintiff institution, founded in 1861 by the name of the British Home for Incurables, and in 1899 incorporated by Royal Charter by its present name. Held, that, having regard to entries in a book kept by the testatrix containing particulars of her charitable contributions, she distinguished the two institutions as the "Royal" and the "British," and, therefore, on the true construction of the codicil, the Royal Hospital for Incurables was entitled to the legacy. | Condition—Marriage against mother's wish—Consent given—Power of retraction.—By a codicil made in 1891 the testator directed that, in the event of his youngest daughter marrying against her mother's wish, a legacy of 500 l. and all her share of moneys from the estate were to be settled on her for life, with remainder to her children, and, failing children, were to be divided between her brother and sister. In May 1893 the daughter became engaged with the consent of her parents, their consent being given on condition that the marriage was put off for two years, as the intended husband was not at the time of the consent in a position, as the parents considered, to marry. The testator died in Feb. 1895. The engagement was still recognised by the widow, but she stipulated that the marriage should not take place until the following August, six months after the testator's death. To this the daughter agreed. Subsequently there were disputes between the daughter and the mother, mainly as to the form of the settlement. The daughter left her mother's house and was married in June. The day before the marriage the mother wrote withdrawing her consent. Held, that the consent to the marriage was given with full knowledge of all the circumstances, and nothing had occurred subsequently which justified its retraction; that the refusal of consent by the mother had reference to the date fixed for the marriage and not to the marriage itself; that the daughter had not married against her mother's wish, and that she was absolutely entitled to the legacy and to her share in the testator's residuary estate. | Construction—Ambiguity—Referring to codicil to clear up ambiguity—Gift contingent on surviving tenant for life—Class gift—Gift to a class and a named person—Lapse.—A testatrix directed her residuary real and personal estate to be converted into money and the income to be paid to a niece for her life, and on the tenant for life's decease the testatrix directed her trustees to divide the trust estate equally between the brothers and sisters of the tenant for life living at the latter's decease and A., B., and C. in equal shares, "and should either of them be dead leaving children such children are to take the share their deceased parent would have been entitled to." By a codicil the testatrix recited that she had in her will directed her residuary estate to be sold and the proceeds divided between the persons therein named, and desired a great-niece to have a share in her residuary estate equally with the others named in the will and bequeathed her the same accordingly. The testatrix died in 1901, and the tenant for life in 1902. One brother only of the tenant for life, and no sister, was living at the tenant for life's death. Of A., B., and C., A. had predeceased the testatrix, and B., though he survived the testatrix, died before the tenant | 502 |
| for life. A. and B. were half-brothers of the testatrix, but C. was a stranger in blood. Upon an originating summons taken out for the determination of the questions who were the persons entitled to the residuary estate, whether A.'s share devolved upon the next of kin of the testatrix or became divisible between the other legatees, and whether the gift of a share to B. was contingent on his surviving the tenant for life. Held, that on the will alone there was an ambiguity as to whether the estate was divisible in moieties or in equal shares among all who took, but that the court was entitled to refer to the codicil to clear up the ambiguity, and that the codicil made it clear that the estate was divisible in equal shares. Held, also, that the gift of a share to B. was not contingent on his surviving the tenant for life, and that, in view of the judgments of the House of Lords in Kingsbury v. Walter (84 L. T. Rep. 697; (1901) A. C. 187), the gift could not be construed as a class gift, and that A.'s share therefore lapsed to the testatrix's next of kin. (Re Venn; Lindon v. Ingram) | 502 |
| Construction—Gift to tenant for life with remainder to a class, their children to take by substitution—Occurrence of events not contemplated by testator.—A gift by will to a class to take effect after a life estate, with a substitutional gift to the children of deceased members of the class, expressed in words of futurity, does not let in the children of a member of the class in a case where, he having survived the tenant for life, both die after the date of the will during testator's life. (Re Kinnear, deceased; Kinnear v. Barnett) | 537 |
| Construction—Gift to the children of A.—"Die without leaving children"—Vested interests.—A testator gave his property in trust for his wife for life and upon her death to his daughter A., but if she should be then dead to any child or children of A., and "failing such issue of" A., to his daughter B., but if she should be then dead to any child or children of B.; but should A. and B. be then both dead "leaving no issue," then, in case of each or either of them being married leaving a husband or husbands then surviving, to the husbands or to the survivor of such husband. B. was dead, leaving one child. A. was still living, and had three children. Held, that the case fell within the rule that where a vested interest was given to children it was not to be divested by a gift over if the parent died without leaving children. (Re Bradbury; Wing v. Bradbury) | 824 |
| Construction—Gift "to the eldest son of my sister"—Intestacy.—A testator by his will made in 1822 devised real estate in strict settlement, and, in the event of the failure of the previous limitations, which happened, "to the eldest son of my sister, F. M. G., and his heirs for ever." The testator died in 1860. At the date of the will F. M. G. had two sons, both of whom died in the lifetime of the testator intestate and without issue. Two other sons, born after the date of the will, survived the testator. One died intestate and without issue before the failure of the previous limitations. The fourth born son of F. M. G. was her eldest surviving son at the time of the failure of the previous limitations. Held, that there was an intestacy. (Amyot v. Dwaris and others) | 102 |

Failures for remoteness.—A will, dated in 1854, contained a series of limitations in strict settlement under which, on the death of A. without issue in 1891, B. became tenant for life in possession, with remainder to the plaintiff, his eldest son, an infant, as tenant in tail, with divers remainders over, including a remainder to C., the plaintiff's uncle, who was born in 1860, for life, with remainders over. By a codicil, dated in 1868, the testator directed and declared that no devise of any of his real estates devised under or by virtue of his will should have a vested interest therein or be entitled to the possession of the same until the attainment of the age of twenty-four years, anything contained in his will or any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. The testator died in 1879. Held, that, regard being had to the terms of the codicil, the limitations of the will took effect by way of executory devise and not by way of contingent remainder; and had failed for remoteness. (Re Wrightson; Battie-Wrightson v. Thomas.) ... 748		interest.—Interest upon surplus income.—Where there is a notional conversion of a wasting security, as in Meyer v. Simonsen (5 De G. & Sm. 723), interest thereon should now be allowed to the tenant for life at the rate of 3 per cent. only. The surplus income of the wasting security, after providing for the 3 per cent., goes to capital, but the interest thereon to the tenant for life. (Re Woods; Gabellini v. Woods.) ... 5
Construction—Precatory trust—Gift absolute or on trust—Gift in default of disposition—Repugnancy.—A testator gave, devised, and bequeathed to his wife "the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit; and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be divided among the surviving said nieces." The testator's wife and seven nieces survived him. Held (by Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J. dissenting), that there was an absolute gift to the widow unaffected by any precatory trust in favour of the nieces, and the words "in default of any disposition," &c., imposed a condition which was repugnant to the previous absolute gift and could not be construed as creating an executory devise or gift over after the absolute gift, and must therefore be rejected. Per Cozens-Hardy, L.J.: The widow took more than a life interest, and, should all the nieces predecease her, her absolute interest would remain; but the surviving nieces, if any, were sufficiently indicated as the persons to take after her death; and this overriding intention could be given effect to without unduly straining the language of the will. (Re Hanbury; Hanbury v. Fisher.) ... 66		Forfeiture—Endowment for national school—Gift over in event of school becoming subject to the control of a school board—Education authority.—A testator, who died in 1891, bequeathed certain shares in a bank to trustees "upon trust to pay and apply the interest or income thereof in or towards the annual expenses of" a national school so long as it was "supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore in addition to the Government grant," with a gift over in the event of the school "ceasing to be so supported or becoming subject to the control of a school board." Since the death of the testator the necessity for subscriptions had practically ceased owing to the bequest, but the managers were in debt to a small extent. By the Education Act 1902 school boards were abolished, and public elementary schools came under the control of the county council as the education authority. Held, that there had been no forfeiture on either of the grounds mentioned by the testator, and that the gift over did not take effect. (Re Beard's Trusts; Butlin v. Harris.) ... 274
Construction—Settlement estate duty payable on personality.—Direction to pay testamentary expenses.—A testator who died in 1899, by his will made in 1895, bequeathed legacies to three sons "free of all duties," and then bequeathed legacies of larger amounts to his daughter and two younger sons without adding the words "free of all duties," and directed his daughter's legacy to be retained by the trustees and held upon the same trusts as her share of residue thereafter given to her. He then gave his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for conversion, and directed that out of the proceeds of sale the trustees should pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies and the legacy duty thereon, and should stand possessed of the residue in trust for his daughter and his two younger sons. He afterwards settled the daughter's share upon trusts for the benefit of herself and issue. Upon an originating summons taken out by the trustees for the determination of the question whether the settlement estate duty payable on the daughter's settled legacy and settled share of residue was payable out of that legacy and share of residue or out of the general residuary estate: Held, that the settlement estate duty was not a testamentary expense, and was payable out of the settled property and not out of the general residuary estate. (Re King; Travers v. Kelly.)... 281		Forfeiture clause—"Shall thenceforth cease and determine"—Alienation or bankruptcy—Marriage within certain degree of kindred, or without consent of trustees—Marriage between date of will and death of testator.—A testator declared that certain benefits given by the will to his sons and daughters should "thenceforth cease and determine" on alienation or bankruptcy, or if they married within a certain degree of kindred, and as to his daughters without the written consent of his trustees. Between the date of the will and the death of the testator a daughter married within that degree. Held (Cozens-Hardy, L.J. dissenting), that there was sufficient in the context of the will to show that the testator intended the provision as to forfeiture to apply only to marriages which took place after his death. Per Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.: The decision in Metcalf v. Metcalf (65 L. T. Rep. 426; (1891) 3 Ch. 1), in which it was held that a forfeiture clause took effect in the case of bankruptcy or alienation between the date of the will and the testator's death, applies only to the particular acts of forfeiture there considered. (Re Chapman; Perkins v. Chapman.) ... 339
Construction—Wasting security—Notional conversion—Tenant for life and remainderman—Rate of		Legacy—Intended satisfaction of an obligation—Legatee predeceasing testatrix—Lapse.—Where a testatrix, in exercise of a power of appointment, appointed a sum to her brother in satisfaction of certain over-payments received by her out of trust funds of which he was the sole trustee, it was held that, as the appointment was made with the intention of performing a moral obligation and not of conferring a bounty, the gift did not lapse through the testatrix being predeceased by her brother. (Stevens v. King.) ... 665
		Power—Excessive execution— Cy-pris .—Hereditaments were limited to the use of B. R. for life, with remainder to the use of his children, or other issue born in his lifetime, for such estates and in such shares as B. R. should by deed or will appoint, and in default to the use of his children in fee simple as tenants in common. B. R. by his will appointed to his son W. for life, with remainder to his sons in tail male, with remainder to his daughters in tail male, with remainder to B. R.'s daughter for life, with remainder to her sons in tail male, with remainder to her daughters, with divers remainders over. Held, that W. did not take an estate in tail general or in tail male, and that all the remainders subsequent to the life estate

| Power of appointment and advancement—Hotchpot clause. —A testator gave his real and residuary personal estate upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death for his four children as his wife should by will appoint. In default of appointment the children were to take equally. The testator's will contained a power of advancement. Any child who had received any part of the funds under any appointment was, in default of appointment to the contrary, to bring the appointed funds into hotchpot. After the testator's death 705l. was advanced to R., one of his children. The widow subsequently by her will appointed one equal fourth part of the property of which she was tenant for life to each of two of her children absolutely, and one equal fourth part upon trust for each of her other children (of whom R. was one) respectively for life, with remainder to their respective children. No reference was made in the widow's will to the 705l. advanced to R. Held, that R. was not liable to bring into hotchpot or account for the 705l. advanced to him out of his expectant share. (Re Fox; Wodehouse v. Fox.) | 477 | Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Accident arising "out of" employment—Injury by lightning—Risk incidental to particular employment. —A bricklayer employed upon the construction of a building exceeding 30ft. in height was killed by lightning when working upon a scaffolding at a height of 23ft. from the ground. Evidence was given that a man working in that position incurred a risk substantially greater than the normal risk of being struck by lightning, and the County Court judge found that the accident arose "out of" the employment. Held, that the County Court judge had properly found that the accident arose "out of" the employment. (Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society.) | 611 |
| Precatory trust—Absolute gift followed by expression of desire. —The decisions of the Court of Appeal in Re Diggles (59 L. T. Rep. 884; 39 Ch. Div. 253), Re Hamilton (72 L. T. Rep. 748; (1895) 2 Ch. 370), and Re Williams (76 L. T. Rep. 600; (1897) 2 Ch. 12) are not inconsistent with the rule laid down by Lord Alvanley in Malim v. Keighley (2 Ves. 333, 335) as to what creates a trust in the case of a gift, which was approved of by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (11 Cl. & F. 513, 548). Testatrix devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property equally amongst her two daughters as tenants in common for their own absolute use and benefit, and appointed them her executrices. She then continued: "My desire is that each of my said two daughters shall during the lifetime of my son pay to him one-third of the respective incomes of my said two daughters accruing from the moneys and investments under this my will." Held, that the expression of the testatrix's desire was not sufficient to cut down the former absolute gift, and no trust was created in favour of the son. (Re Oldfield; Oldfield v. Oldfield.) | 307 | Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Agreement for payment of weekly sum—Subsequent acceptance of work at reduced wages—Application by workman to have memorandum of agreement registered—"Genuineness" of memorandum. —A workman received injuries by accident which rendered him for a time totally incapable of work. He agreed to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and an agreement was duly entered into between him and his employers, by which he was to receive half his average weekly earnings at the time of the accident. He partially recovered, and was offered and accepted from his employers lighter work at reduced wages. On his resumption of work at the reduced wages, he admitted that he was no longer entitled to the former weekly sum as compensation, and negotiations took place, but no new agreement was come to as to the weekly amount of compensation he was to receive in addition to his reduced wages. The workman subsequently applied to a County Court to have the memorandum of the agreement registered under sched. 2, clause 8, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, but the County Court judge refused to register the memorandum of the agreement upon the ground that the memorandum was not then applicable to the facts of the case, and that therefore the agreement was not then "genuine" within the meaning of the rules. Held, that the word "genuineness" in clause 8 refers to the memorandum and not to the agreement, and that, as the memorandum accurately represented the agreement which had been come to, it was a "genuine" memorandum within the meaning of the clause, and ought to have been registered, although the agreement itself was no longer applicable to the altered circumstances of the case. (Blake v. Midland Railway Company.) | 433 |
| Probate—Action for revocation—Counter-claim propounding will—Notice by plaintiff to cross-examine—Costs—Practice. —The plaintiff brought an action for revocation of probate which had been granted in common form, and the defendant, by way of counter-claim, propounded the will. In his reply and defence to the counter-claim the plaintiff gave notice, under Order XXI, r. 18, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, that he merely insisted on the will being proved in solemn form, and that it was simply his intention to cross-examine the witnesses. Held, that in the construction of this rule the principle which guided the Ecclesiastical Courts and the Probate Courts ought to be considered; that there was a distinction between a party who sought a revocation of probate and one who entered a caveat and took the ordinary steps to oppose a will being admitted to proof; and that the present plaintiff could not secure the benefit of the rule as to costs, since the notice given by him was bad. (Tomalin v. Smart.) | 171 | Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Employment—"Factory." —The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, by sect. 7 (2), provides that "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Act of 1901 is applied. By sect. 105 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 certain provisions of the Act are to "have effect as if any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, were included in the word 'factory.'" Held, that a building of the description specified in sect. 105 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 is not a "factory," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, merely because some provisions of the Act of 1901 are applied thereto. (Dyer v. Swift Cycle Company Limited.) | 613 |

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Employment—On, in, or about a wharf—Fireman on steamer moored to wharf.—A passenger steamer was made fast to a landing pontoon outside a dock, and gangways were out connecting the vessel with the pontoon in order to enable passengers to go on board. A seaman employed as a fireman on the steamer was injured by an explosion while he was attending to the boilers. Held, that the workman was not employed on, in, or about the wharf, inasmuch as his employment had no connection with the purposes for which the wharf was being used by his employers, and that therefore he was not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. (Owens v. P. and A. Campbell Limited.)... ..	811	Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Right of action for damages—Exercise of option between two remedies—Infant—"Workman."—An infant workman met with an injury in the course of his employment under circumstances which entitled him either to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, or to bring an action for damages for negligence against his employers. The employer offered him compensation under the Act, which he accepted in full satisfaction and discharge of all his claims against them in respect of his injury. He afterwards brought an action against them for damages for negligence. Held, that there was nothing in the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 which deprived the infant workman of his right to repudiate a contract which was not to his benefit. (Stephens v. Dudbridge Ironworks Company Limited.)	838
Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—"Factory"—Ship in a dock—"Workman"—Seaman.—A ship moored to buoys in a dock preparatory to proceeding to sea occupies part of a factory within sect. 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901. An able seaman employed in the ordinary duties of a seaman on such a ship is a "workman" within sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and, subject to the provisions of that Act, is entitled to be compensated by the shipowners for personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of such employment. So held by Collins, M.R. and Cozens-Hardy, L.J., Mathew, L.J. dissenting. (Griffin v. Houlder Line Limited.)	142	Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Scheme under Workmen's Compensation Act 1897—Bar to a right of action for damages for negligence.—By a scheme which had been duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies under sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, a society was established to raise funds by the contributions of the employers and the workmen at certain collieries to make provision for the workmen in case of accidents; and the rules of the society provided that the contributions made by the employers to the society were to be in lieu of, and to exempt them from, any further claims which otherwise the members of the society might be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment. A workman who had accepted this scheme and become a member of the society met with an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment which resulted in his death. His widow, after receiving certain sums as compensation under the terms of the scheme, brought an action against the deceased's employers under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 to recover damages for the death of her husband. Held, that under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 the acceptance of the scheme was a bar to her action for damages. (Taylor v. Hamstead Colliery Company Limited.)	363
Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Review of award—Profits of trade carried on by workman—"Average amount which he is able to earn after the accident."—Upon an application to review an award of a weekly payment to an injured workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, the fact that since the accident the workman has started a trade or business of his own from which he is deriving profits should be taken into consideration for the purpose of deciding whether the weekly payment should be ended or diminished. (Norman and Burt v. Walder.)	631	Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Weekly payment—Application to review—Change of circumstances— Res judicata .—The employer of a workman receiving weekly payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 applied for a review of the weekly payment, under clause 12 of the 1st schedule to the Act, upon the ground that the workman was no longer incapacitated for work. The County Court judge, acting upon the evidence of medical experts that the workman was not incapacitated for work, reduced the weekly payments to the nominal sum of 1d. Subsequently the workman applied for a review of the weekly payment upon the ground that since the previous hearing he had repeatedly been refused, and had been unable to obtain, work owing to incapacity arising from his physical condition caused by the accident. The County Court judge refused to entertain the application, upon the ground that the matter was res judicata , and that no change of circumstances since the previous hearing was alleged which would give him jurisdiction to review the weekly payment. Held, that the matter was not res judicata , and that sufficient change of circumstances was alleged to give the judge jurisdiction to entertain the application. (Sharman v. Holliday and Greenwood Limited.)... ..	46
Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Review of weekly payment—Fluctuations of wages at collieries—Alteration in maximum of compensation.—A workman employed as a haulier in a colliery was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, by which he was totally incapacitated for work for several months. In the district where he was working the rate of wages for hauliers were fixed every three months by a conciliation board, the rate varying with the price of coal. During the workman's total incapacity for work, his employers made him a weekly payment of half the wages which he was earning at the date of the accident, as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Afterwards they took him back into their service at an employment on light work, and gave him as weekly wages a sum which was larger than the weekly payment which they had been making him, and which was the same amount as hauliers then were receiving, the rate of hauliers' wages having fallen since his accident. At the same time the employers ceased to continue the weekly payment to the workman. He therefore applied to the County Court judge, as for a review of his weekly payment, to have the weekly payment fixed. The County Court judge held that the maximum which had been originally fixed on the average weekly earnings at the time of the accident was subject to variation from time to time to the same extent as the rate of wages as fixed by the conciliation board; and he also held that as the workman was then receiving from his employers the same rate of wages as was then being received by hauliers, the workman was not entitled to any weekly payment, but he made a declaration of the employers' liability under the Workmen's

MONTGOMERY AND CO. v. WALLACE-JAMES. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE FIRST DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Practice—Appeal on question of fact—Concurrent findings of two courts below.

There is no rule of practice in the House of Lords that the House will not entertain an appeal on a question of fact where there have been concurrent findings in the courts below.

(68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207) explained by Lord Davey.*

*Judgment of the court below reversed on the facts

APPEAL from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (Lords Adam, McLaren, and Kinneir), reported 4 F. 771; 39 Sc. L. Rep. 517, who had affirmed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Kincairney).

The action was brought by the respondent, a resident in the burgh of Haddington, for a suspension and interdict to prohibit the appellants from encroaching upon a piece of land alleged to be part of a piece of common land used by the inhabitants of the burgh for recreation and other purposes.

The case is also reported in 2 F. 107; 37 Sc.
L. Rep. 83 upon a preliminary point as to the title of the pursuer, as one of the public, to sue under the circumstances of the case, but this point was not raised in the House of Lords.

The main question was one of fact, whether the piece of land in question was proved to be part of the common.

The courts below gave judgment for the pursuer.

Clyde, K.C. and Constable (both of the Scotch Bar) for the appellants.

The Lord Advocate (Scott-Dickson, K.C.), Wilson, K.C., and Lawrie (all of the Scotch Bar)
for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 18. — Their Lordships gave judgment

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury). — My
Lords: I think that this appeal should be allowed.
It is simply a question of fact, and doubtless, where a question of fact has been decided by a tribunal which has seen and heard the witnesses, the greatest weight ought to be attached to the finding of such a tribunal. It has had the opportunity of observing the demeanour of the witnesses, and judging of their veracity and accuracy in a way that no appellate tribunal can do.
But where no question is raised as to truthfulness, and the question is as to the proper inferences to be drawn from truthful evidence, then the original tribunal is in no better position to decide than the judges of an appellate court. [His Lordship then discussed the facts and evidence in the case.]

Lord SHAND. — My Lords: I am also of opinion that this appeal should be sustained, and the action dismissed with costs. It is with great reluctance that I come to the conclusion that an appeal should be sustained against concurrent judgments of the Lord Ordinary and the division of the court on a question which is entirely one of fact.
The Lord Advocate pressed strongly upon the House that the judgment should be affirmed, because the case, which turns on fact, had been decided by the Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses, and himself heard their evidence, and his judgment has been sustained by the unanimous judgment of the learned judges of the division

on appeal. No one is disposed to give greater importance to such circumstances than I am, but the facts of the case as proved seem to me clearly to show (1) a complete failure on the part of the complainer to establish the alleged immemorial possession for forty years, on which the case depends, and (2) that important facts in the evidence as to the character of the alleged public uses have been overlooked or disregarded in the matters to which I shall immediately refer, and that these uses are quite insufficient to establish the rights claimed, or any of them, to which effect has been given by the judgments complained of. [His Lordship went on to discuss the evidence.]

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: Before I address myself to a consideration of the evidence in the case, I desire to make an observation of a general character. It was pressed upon your Lordships by the counsel for the respondent that this House would not disturb the concurrent findings of two courts below upon a question of fact, and reference was made to what was said in the cases of Gray v. Turnbull (L. Rep. 2 H. L. Sc. 53), The P. Caland (68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207), and McIntyre v. McGavin (69 L. T. Rep. 389; (1893) A. C. 268). But when these observations are carefully read it will be found that they do not lay down any rule of practice, such as is followed by the Judicial Committee, at any rate in Indian appeals, that this House will not entertain an appeal on a question of fact where there have been concurrent findings in the courts below. I do not disagree with what Lord Herschell, L.C. is reported to have said in the case of The P. Caland if it be regarded merely as a guide to the judgment of the tribunal, and not as a rule of law or practice. In all cases your Lordships should and would pay the greatest respect to the concurrent findings of two courts on a question of fact. When the question depends on the credibility of witnesses, the opinion of the judge who heard the evidence would in most cases be conclusive. In every case the appellant assumes the burden of showing that the judgment appealed from is wrong, and when it depends on an estimate of probabilities or inferences so nicely balanced that it is impossible to say that a decision either way would be wrong, every material fact having received due consideration, your Lordships would, I make no doubt, be disposed to affirm the concurrent decisions of the courts below. Some noble and learned Lords have lamented that an appeal lies to this House on questions of fact, but, so long as that is the law, I think that this House cannot decline the duty of forming and expressing its own judgment, after taking into account all the considerations to which I have referred. [His Lordship went on to discuss the evidence, and concluded as follows:] I am of opinion that the respondent has failed to sustain the issue tendered by him, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD ROBERTSON concurred.

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: I also have carefully examined the evidence in order to see if it justified the inference that there had been forty years' user as of right of the piece of land in question as alleged by the respondent. I have come to the conclusion that the evidence falls far short of what is necessary to establish any such user. I entirely concur in thinking that there is no law or settled practice of this House to prevent it from differing even from two concurrent findings of fact if, on a careful consideration of the evidence, this House comes to the conclusion that those findings are wrong. The appeal ought, in my opinion, to be allowed with costs in the usual way.

Interlocutors appealed from reversed, and appeal allowed with costs in this House and in the courts below.

BELL v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Revenue—Income tax—Banking company—Purchase of business of another bank—"Succession"—Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, sched. D, first and second cases, rule 4.

A banking company with many branches, and having its head office in London, in Feb. 1899 purchased for 225,000l., as from the 31st Dec. 1898, the premises, business, and assets of the S. Bank, which carried on business at W. only. The business of the S. Bank was carried on as usual until the evening of the 5th March 1899, when the premises were closed. On the following morning the same premises were opened by the company as their branch at W., the whole of the staff of the S. Bank being taken over, and business was thenceforward carried on there by the company. The accounts and profits of this branch were merged in and formed part of the general accounts and profits of the company which were dealt with at the head office.

For each of the three years subsequent to 1898 assessments to income tax were made upon the company on their own returns based on the average profits of their whole business for the three years preceding the year of assessment.

Additional assessments for each of the three years subsequent to 1898 were made upon the company on assumed profits of their branch at W., based upon the average profits of the S. Bank for the three years before the sale to the company, upon the ground that the company had "succeeded" to the business of the S. Bank, within the 4th rule applicable to the first and second cases in sched. D to sect. 100 of the Income Tax Act 1842.

Held (reversing the judgment of Ridley, J.), that the company had "succeeded" to the business of the S. Bank, and were therefore liable to the additional assessments.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL of Bell from the judgment of Ridley, J., upon a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The facts stated in the case were as follows:—

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts and for executing the Acts relating to the Inhabited House Duties for the City of London, held on the 12th July 1900, the 8th Nov. 1900, and the 1st May 1902, the National Provincial Bank of England Limited appealed against an assessment of 4818*l.* beyond their assessment on their own return of 228,493*l.* for the year ending the 5th April 1900, against an assessment of 3218*l.* beyond their assessment on their own return of 299,768*l.* for the year ending the 5th April 1901, and against an assessment of 1634*l.* beyond their assessment on their own return of 300,253*l.* for the year ending the 5th April 1902, under sched. D to the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 (copies of which assessments are annexed to and made part of this case), under the following circumstances:

2. The National Provincial Bank of England Limited, which was established in the year 1833, and is now registered under the Companies Acts with a nominal authorised capital of 15,000,000*l.*, on which 3,000,000*l.* has been paid, has since its foundation transacted and transacts banking business at the head office in Bishopsgate-street, in the city of London, and at a large number of branch establishments in London and various parts of England and Wales, such branch establishments now numbering 199.

3. The County of Stafford Bank Limited was established in the year 1836, under the name of the Bilston District Banking Company, with a deed of settlement. In 1873 the company was registered under the Companies Act 1862 as a company with unlimited liability, and the name of the company was changed to that of the County of Stafford Bank Limited, the registered capital being 800,000*l.*, divided into 20,000 shares of 40*l.* each. The head office and banking house of the company was at Wolverhampton, and, under the regulations registered as the articles of association, the business of the company was to be carried on there and at such other places as the board might from time to time appoint. The company was also empowered to establish such branch banks, agencies, and local boards in the United Kingdom as the directors thought proper. As a matter of fact, however, the business was only carried on at Wolverhampton, and the powers conferred on the company under these regulations of establishing other business branch banks, agencies, and local boards were not exercised.

4. By agreements dated respectively the 6th Feb. 1899 and March 1899, the whole of the business of the County of Stafford Bank Limited, which had carried on business for some sixty-two years previously on the same premises and without any branches, its business premises, furniture and fixtures, and such of its assets and liabilities as were and are provided by the said agreements and shown in the balance-sheets annexed to the latter of the said agreements, was and were, as from the close of the business on the 31st Dec. 1898, purchased by the appellant company for the sum of 225,000*l.* under and upon the terms of the said agreements. Copies of the said agreements and of the said balance-sheets are annexed hereto and marked A, B, and C respectively, and form part of the case. The business of the County of Stafford Bank was carried on as usual for the benefit and at the expense of the appellant company until the close of the business at 4 p.m. on the 5th March 1899, when the premises were closed.

5. On the following morning—viz., the 6th March—the same premises were opened as their Wolverhampton branch by the National Provincial Bank of England Limited, who had never previously had any branch or carried on any business at Wolverhampton. The manager and the whole of the former staff were taken over by and have, subject to necessary and ordinary changes, since continued to remain there in the employ of the National Provincial Bank of England Limited. Business has since been carried on by the appellant company at the same premises; none of the books of the County of Stafford Bank Limited were taken over or continued in use by the appellant company except that the ledgers, being found to be in the same form as those used by the appellant company, were continued in use by them to the end of the current year. In such of the pass-books as were continued in use a notice was inserted by means of a rubber stamp to the effect that as from the 1st Jan. 1899 the account was with the National Provincial Bank of England Limited, but all new cheque-books and pass-books were issued in the name of the National Provincial Bank of England Limited. As provided by the latter of the said agreements, the County of Stafford Bank was not dissolved until six months after the date thereof; and the liquidators did not make up their final account or distribute the purchase money until a considerable period had elapsed.

6. From the 31st Dec. 1898 the profits (if any) earned at and by the appellant company's said Wolverhampton branch merged in and formed part of the general profits of the National Provincial Bank of England Limited without any distinction as to source or origin of profit, and there are no means for ascertaining whether there were any profits, or the proportion of increase or decrease (if any) in the profits of the bank which has arisen from the business, &c., so purchased as aforesaid.

7. The ultimate profits divisible among the shareholders of the National Provincial Bank of England Limited are the result of the trading of the company as a whole, including the head office and all the branches, irrespective of the profit and loss arising from the business done at the head office or any particular branch. At and from the head office of the appellant company the general affairs of the company are transacted, and the working of the branches is regulated and supervised by the board of directors and general manager through various departments, such as advance, security, law, inspection, registration, stock and share departments, and others. All profits are received and dealt with by the head office. There are many classes of expenditure which are not and cannot be definitely allocated in any way, such as general management and departmental and establishment expenses, which cannot be definitely attributed to any particular branch.

[CT. OF APP.]

8. The general assessments of the National Provincial Bank for the years ending the 5th April 1901 and the 5th April 1902 include some portions of the profit made by the Wolverhampton branch of the appellant bank, if any were made—viz.: The assessments for the year ending the 5th April 1901, the profits on average for the preceding year 1899, and the assessment for the year ending the 5th April 1902, the profits on average for the preceding years 1899 and 1900; but, as the accounts were merged in the general accounts of the appellant bank, it is impossible to differentiate between the profits made by the Wolverhampton branch of the appellant bank and the general profits of such bank from the time the County of Stafford Bank was taken over. There are no means or accounts which would enable the appellant bank to make a return under the Income Tax Acts of the profits of the said Wolverhampton branch (if any), or apply for the benefit of sect. 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 in respect to such profits if less than the estimate.

9. Profits were made by the County of Stafford Bank Limited from the business at Wolverhampton for each of the three years ending the 31st Dec. 1896, 1897, and 1898 respectively, when the accounts were made up as follows: 1896, 4801l.; 1897, 4750l.; 1898, 4904l.; and the present assessments of 4818l., 3219l., and 1634l. respectively for the years ending the 5th April 1900, the 5th April 1901, and the 5th April 1902, appealed against, are assumed profits made by the National Provincial Bank, based on an estimate for the first year on the average of the profits of the County of Stafford Bank of the three preceding years—viz., 1896, 1897, and 1898—after the usual allowance for dividends, rents, &c., on which income tax had been paid by way of deduction; based for the second of the said years on one-third of the profits of the years 1897 and 1898; and based for the third of the said years on one-third of the profits of the year 1898. An assessment was made on the County of Stafford Bank Limited for the year ending the 5th April 1899, based on the average profits of the three preceding years ending the 31st Dec. 1897, and the duty was paid by the said company. There was no assessment for any one of the years ending the 5th April 1900, the 5th April 1901, or the 5th April 1902, on the County of Stafford Bank Limited.

10. Assessments on their own returns had also been made for the years ending the 5th April 1900, the 5th April 1901, and the 5th April 1902 respectively on the appellant company at its head office in London, on amounts based, subject to the statements above set out in par. 8, on the average of the profits of its whole business for the three years ending respectively on the 31st Dec. 1898, the 31st Dec. 1899, and the 31st Dec. 1900, as shown by the published accounts and balance-sheets for each period of three years respectively, and the duty on such assessments was duly paid by the appellant company.

11. The National Provincial Bank of England Limited duly appealed against such assessments to the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London. On the hearing of such appeals the surveyor of taxes contended that the appellant company was liable to the additional assessments in order to cover such estimated profits, and further contended that there was a succession on the part of the appellant company to the business of the County of Stafford Bank Limited according to the terms of the 4th rule of the first and second cases, sched. D, of sect. 100 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and that, consequently, the appellant company should be assessed to include the estimated profits of the business purchased from the County of Stafford Bank Limited, estimated upon an average of the profits of the said periods of three years respectively of the said County of Stafford Bank Limited.

12. The appellant company contended that the profit (if any) of the business carried on at Wolverhampton during the period covered by such additional assessments could not be made or included in the basis of any assessment against the appellant company for that period, which was by the Act limited to the years 1896, 1897, and 1898, during none of which did the appellant company carry on any business at Wolverhampton; that such profits (if any) were merged in the general profits of the appellant company, and were liable to be extinguished or diminished by reason of losses elsewhere or general expenses, and in any event would, in due course, form part of the basis of assessment. Further, that, if the additional assessment was to be allowed, the bank would be doubly assessed on such portion of their profits (if any) as arose from the business purchased from the County of Stafford Bank. Further, in reply to the contention of the surveyor, they contended that the acquirement by purchase of the business of the County of Stafford Bank was not a succession or such a succession as was contemplated by the Income Tax Acts.

13. The commissioners were of opinion that there was no succession within the meaning of the said 4th rule; also that the said business when purchased was not sufficiently, generally or separately identified after merger in the appellants' business to render the profits (if any) properly subject to separate assessment; and that the appellants were or would be charged with a fair proportion of the profits, and were not liable to be additionally assessed over and above the ordinary assessment on the profits of the National Provincial Bank, and they discharged the assessment accordingly.

The Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35) provides:

Sect. 100. The duties hereby granted, contained in the schedule marked (D), shall be assessed and charged under the following rules, which rules shall be deemed and construed to be a part of this Act, and to refer to the said last-mentioned duties, as if the same had been inserted under a special enactment.

Sched. (D). The said last-mentioned duties shall extend to every description of property or profits which shall not be contained in either of the said schedules (A), (B), or (C), and to every description of employment of profit not contained in schedule (E), and not specially exempted from the said respective duties, and shall be charged annually on and paid by the persons, bodies politic or corporate, fraternities, fellowships, companies, or societies, whether corporate or not corporate, receiving or entitled unto the same, their executors, administrators, successors, and assigns respectively.

Rules for ascertaining the said last-mentioned duties in the particular cases herein mentioned: First case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act. First.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed at a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of the year, immediately preceding the year of assessment, on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, shall have been usually made up, or on the fifth day of April preceding the year of assessment, and shall be assessed, charged, and paid without any other deduction than is hereinafter allowed.

Rules applying to both the preceding cases.—Fourth: If amongst any persons engaged in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or in any profession, in partnership together, any change shall take place in any such partnership either by death or by dissolution of partnership as to all or any of the partners, or by admitting any other partner therein, before the time of making the assessment, or within the period for which the assessment ought to be made under this Act, or if any person shall have succeeded to any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or any profession within such respective periods as aforesaid, the duty payable in respect of such partnership, or any of such partners, or any person succeeding to such profession, trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, shall be computed and ascertained according to the profits and gains of such business derived during the respective periods herein mentioned, notwithstanding such change therein or succession to such business as aforesaid, unless such partners, or such person succeeding to such business as aforesaid, shall prove to the satisfaction of the respective commissioners that the profits and gains of such business have fallen short or will fall short from some specific cause, to be alleged by them, since such change or succession took place, or by reason thereof.

Upon the argument of the special case before Ridley, J., the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants: (88 L. T. Rep. 840).

The surveyor of taxes appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay (A.-G.), Sir E. Carson (S.-G.), and S. A. T. Rowlatt for the Crown.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that there was not, in this case, a "succession" within the meaning of the 4th rule. Upon the facts stated in the case, it appears clearly that the respondents succeeded to the business at Wolverhampton of the County of Stafford Bank. A banking company just as much succeeds to the business of another bank which it purchases for the purpose of amalgamating with, and carrying on as a branch of, its already existing business as it would if it had been formed for the purpose of purchasing such a business and had no previously existing business. The contention of the respondents amounts to this, that for the first year after the purchase of the Stafford Bank they are to be assessed only in respect of their own profits for the preceding years, and that no income tax at all is to be payable by anyone in respect of the profits of the Stafford Bank during those three years. That would be quite contrary to the intention of the Act. It might be that, if such a business as this were purchased for the purpose of discontinuing and extinguishing it, and it was extinguished, there would be no succession within the 4th rule. This business, however, was from the moment of transfer carried on as before, as a branch of the respondents' business. The case of Ferguson v. Aikin (4 Tax Cases, 36) was not the same as the present case. There the distillery which was purchased was not being carried on as a business when it was purchased, and, the commissioners having found as a fact that the business carried on at the distillery was a new business, the court refused to review their decision. In Prescott, Dimsdale, and Co. v. Bank of England (70 L. T. Rep. 7; (1894) 1 Q. B. 351) the question was a very different one from that in the present case, and was raised under an entirely different statute.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Paget, K.C. for the respondents.—The decision of the learned judge was right, and the respondents are not liable to these assessments. The question is really one of fact, and there is no appeal from the commissioners on a question of fact. This is really the case of one banking business with many branches, which is therefore liable to one assessment only in respect of the whole of its business:

Prince v. Oriental Bank Corporation, 38 L. T. Rep. 41; 3 App. Cas. 325;

London Bank of Mexico and South America v. Apthorpe, 65 L. T. Rep. 601; (1891) 2 Q. B. 378;

San Paulo Brazilian Railway Company v. Carter, 73 L. T. Rep. 538; (1896) A. C. 31.

Those cases show that the business carried on at a branch is not a separate business, but is only a part of the whole business of the company. An assessment must be upon the business of the person to be charged. The respondents must be assessed at their head office in London, and must be there assessed upon the whole of their business. The assessment is upon an estimated amount of profit by reference to the average profit of the three preceding years. The company is assessed because it is carrying on business in the year of assessment, and not because profits were earned in the previous three years. The respondents have been assessed in respect of the whole of their business, and, if this further assessment is made upon them, they will be assessed twice over upon a part of their profits. They did not succeed to the business of the Stafford Bank; that bank ceased to exist in 1899; the respondents did not carry on that bank at all, but really opened at Wolverhampton a new branch of their existing business. The commissioners have found as a fact that the respondents are not carrying on the old business; that the identity of the old business is not preserved in the new branch of the respondents; and their finding on that question is conclusive:

Ferguson v. Aikin, 4 Tax Cases, 36;

Watson Brothers v. Lothian, 4 Tax Cases, 441;

Ryhope Coal Company v. Foyer, 45 L. T. Rep. 404; 7 Q. B. Div. 485;

Prescott, Dimsdale, and Co. v. Bank of England, 70 L. T. Rep. 7; (1894) 1 Q. B. 351.

To constitute a succession there must be the same business carried on as a distinct business. The opening of a new branch business is not the carrying on of the old business, and is not the establishment of a new business:

Re Capital and Counties Bank, 61 L. T. Rep. 516.

Sir R. B. Finlay (A.-G.) was not called upon to reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Ridley, J. on a question of income tax. The facts which raise the question are shortly these: The National Provincial Bank of England in the year 1899 acquired by purchase the business of the County of Stafford Bank, and the question is, in respect of the assessment to income tax, whether under rule 4 of sect. 100, under sched. D, there was a succession brought about by that purchase so as to let in the provisions of rule 4 defining how the income tax is to be assessed upon such succession. The words of that rule are these, and perhaps I had better go back to the beginning and take the first case: "Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act." Then comes the 1st rule: "The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall have been usually made up, or on the fifth day of April preceding the year of assessment, and shall be assessed, charged, and paid without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed." Now, I come to the 4th rule: "If amongst any persons engaged in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or in any profession, in partnership together, any change shall take place in any such partnership either by death, or dissolution of partnership as to all or any of the partners, or by admitting any other partner therein, before the time of making the assessment or within the period for which the assessment ought to be made under this Act, or"—this is the case we have to deal with here—"if any person shall have succeeded to any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or any profession, within such respective periods as aforesaid, the duty payable in respect of such partnership, or of any such partners, or any person succeeding to such profession, trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, shall be computed and ascertained according to the profits and gains of such business accrued during the respective periods herein mentioned, notwithstanding such change therein or succession to such business as aforesaid," unless some special reason is shown. That means, in the case of a succession, the ordinary three years' rule, to which I have referred, in rule 1 is to be applied. That raises a question upon the figures here, and an important question, because if there was a succession then the profits which had been made in the old business—that is, in the business of the Stafford Bank which was taken over—would have had to be assessed in the manner prescribed by rule 1—that is, upon an average of the three preceding years. If, on the other hand, there was no succession, which was the point taken for the bank, it would then have been entitled to treat, as it has treated in this case, the acquisition of the old bank, the Stafford Bank, as if it were merely an opening by them for the first time of a new branch, with the result that, when they came to deal with the income tax, they would treat the whole concern as one concern—that is, the National Provincial Bank—and they would make their assessment to income tax by reference to profits in the three preceding years; and, inasmuch as there would be no profits on that hypothesis made by the Stafford Bank, that figure would not come into the calculation, and no figures antecedent to the actual purchase would come in. By that means, of course, the total upon which the income tax would be assessed would be reduced, and on division by three the amount would be considerably smaller than it would be had the three preceding years of business actually done at the Stafford Bank been taken into consideration. So far as the figures are concerned, that raises the point. The bank had been assessed on its own returns, leaving out of the calculation the profits made at the Stafford Bank antecedent to their acquisition of it, and consequently the Income Tax Commissioners have supplemented that assessment by an additional assessment, based upon the principle that the three previous years' profits of the Stafford Bank ought to be taken into consideration. The question, as I have said, is whether there was or was not a succession. If there was a succession, these three years, upon the terms of rule 1, which I have just read, must be taken into the calculation. If there was no succession, as the learned judge has held, then it may be that those years can be excluded, though I am not sure myself that it does follow, as I shall point out presently, that, even if there was no succession, the case must not fall under another provision of another rule which would have the effect of still introducing them into the calculation. The learned judge has held that there was in this case no succession, and he has held that the profits made in previous years by the Stafford Bank do not come into the calculation. On what grounds has he arrived at the conclusion that there was no succession? It seems to me that the words of the 4th rule are plain, and that, if the National Provincial Bank had not existed, but some new company had been formed to take over for the first time the business of the Stafford Bank, there would have been a case directly falling within the words of the 4th rule—"if any person shall have succeeded to any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern." In the case I put of a new company formed for the first time and acquiring the Stafford Bank, that would clearly be a case of a person succeeding to a concern. What difference does it make that the person who succeeds to the concern should himself already have an existing business? Does he the less succeed to the new one because he had the old one? It seems to me certainly not. He had the old one before. He has the old one still and the new one in addition, and to that new one, it seems to me, he has succeeded. It might be, as I think was put by Mathew, L.J. in argument, that a person having an existing business might be desirous of annihilating another business simply to enable him to carry on his existing business with a better profit, and therefore it is conceivable he might take steps to cause the extinction of another business, and after that extinction it might be said that because he had extinguished it he had not succeeded to it. Nothing of the kind has taken place here. The National Provincial Bank acquired by purchase all the goodwill and assets of the old Stafford Bank, and continued to carry it on exactly as it had been carried on before, except, of course, that the accounts and the profits did merge into the main business of the National Provincial Bank. The finding of the commissioners upon that part of the case is this: "The commissioners were of opinion that there was no succession within the meaning of the said fourth rule." That is, as my brother Mathew has pointed out, not a finding in fact that there was no succession, but that the particular kind of succession which took place in this case was not a succession within the meaning of the 4th rule. That is not a finding of fact, but a finding of law and construction based upon the fact that one existing bank did acquire and take over, not for the purpose of extinction, but for the purpose of development, the existing business of another bank existing in another place. It is not the case of forming for the first time a new branch at a place where they had not a branch before. That, I quite agree, would not alter the identity of the existing bank, and would not let in any rule for computing profits by reference to any possible, but absolutely unearned, profits at the new branch, which ex hypothesi could not have earned profits before, since it began its existence for the first time when they opened it. But I do not think that reasoning would apply to a case where there was heretofore an existing business which has somehow or other become the existing business now carried on by the acquiring bank. It seems to me to be absolutely inconsistent. The great point urged by Mr. Danckwerts, in a very elaborate argument before us, was that the question whether there was a succession or not must be a question of fact, and the commissioners must be taken in this case to have found as a fact that there was no succession; and he relied upon the authority of a case decided in Scotland, Ferguson v. Aiken (4 Tax Cases, 36), as showing that it is and must be a question of fact whether there has in point of fact been a succession or not. It may be in many cases, or in some cases at all events, a question of fact; but it seems to me, for the reasons I have already given, that if it was a question of fact for the commissioners in this case they have deliberately not decided it. They have presented to us a problem of law, and they have given us the benefit of their opinion upon it; and, if we do not agree with that, we are entitled to say so. In my view, if this is a finding, as I think it must be, of law that there is no succession within the meaning of the rule, I find myself unable to agree with it for the reasons I have given. The fact that in a particular case, which was a rather exceptional case, in Scotland, the court held that, the commissioners having found that there was no succession in point of fact, they were bound by that finding and disinclined to go behind it, in my opinion presents no difficulty in this case. We have also been pressed with one or two other cases. There was the case of Prescott, Dimsdale, and Co. v. Bank of England (70 L. T. Rep. 7; (1894) 1 Q. B. 351), which Mr. Danckwerts contended was an authority in his favour; but, when that case is looked at, the only point decided was whether the banks which were amalgamated and swept into the new company continued—that is, the separate banks which had been amalgamated in the company—to carry on business after the amalgamation. That was the only point, and it was held that they did not. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no authority which really interferes with our decision of this case upon the construction of the rule itself, and I do not feel myself able to agree with the decision of the learned judge. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was suggested on the part of the respondents that the result of a decision against them would be that they would be taxed twice over. I am entirely unable to accept that suggestion, having regard to the terms of the special case before us. I understand that what has given rise to the question is this: The National Provincial Bank made returns and claimed to be assessed in respect of the business of the National Provincial Bank, excluding the business of the Stafford Bank. That was objected to, and further assessments were made in respect of the business of the Stafford Bank, and the question arose whether those assessments were properly made. It is clear that, if they were properly made, the case comes within the rule, and there has been a succession. How is it possible to put any other interpretation upon the facts than that there has been a succession to the business of the Stafford Bank? It was bought after an elaborate calculation of the profits made by the bank—profits which there was no difficulty in ascertaining from year to year before the agreement to purchase was made. What was handed over was the whole concern, the goodwill, and the right to carry on the business with the same customers as it had been carried on with by the Stafford Bank. I feel unable to follow the ingenious contentions which would alter the word "succession" somehow or other so as to bear such a meaning that this is not a succession within the meaning of the Act. It appears to me to be clearly within the terms of the rule, which is all that it is necessary for me to say. It has become impossible, it is said, to ascertain what the profits of the Stafford Bank ought to be estimated at. All I can say about that is that there was no difficulty in ascertaining the profits of that bank while it was still going, and, I should think, no difficulty in doing it now. It cannot be that, because the National Provincial Bank has not chosen to do that, there is such a merger, as is stated in the case, as to prevent this further assessment being made. The commissioners say there was no "succession within the meaning of the said fourth rule." That is the proposition of law we have to decide as distinguished from fact, and we are entitled to differ from their view. They further say: "Also that the said business when purchased was not sufficiently identified after merger in the appellants' business to render the profits, if any, properly subject to separate assessment." Again, it is contended that under the Act this is not a case in which profits can be ascertained, because there has been such a merger that it is difficult to follow and see what the profits were. The statute applies to an estimate of profits, and gets rid, it seems to me, of that difficulty. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have very little to add. When we look at the agreement of the 6th Feb. 1899, what do we find? We find that the National Provincial Bank paid close upon a quarter of a million (225,000*l.* was the precise figure) for a freehold banking house, and for a particular banking business carried on there by the vendors. The agreement stipulates that the National Provincial Bank is to take over the assets and liabilities, and that the vendor company shall be dissolved as soon as may be; and then there is an important clause which is a covenant by each of the directors that they will not hinder or interrupt the person or persons who on the part of the purchasers shall conduct the said banking business at Wolverhampton. That is exactly and precisely what has been done. The National Provincial Bank have been conducting a banking business of the same nature as before on the same premises, with the same staff of clerks, subject only, as the case finds, to the inevitable necessary variations. It seems to me impossible to contend that that is not a succession within the meaning of the 4th rule, unless we are to say that that rule has no operation except in the single case where the successor was not and is not carrying on any other business of the same nature. In other words, we are asked to say that the 4th rule applies only where the business which has been taken over is isolated, separated, kept apart, and distinct from all other businesses of the successor. I can find no reason for putting that limitation into the words of the section. It seems to me that the National Provincial Bank are none the less successors to the Stafford Bank because they have a very large business of their own and the profits made in respect of or from this particular branch at Wolverhampton are ultimately transmitted to London and go to swell the aggregate profits of the bank. The case seems to me to fall plainly within the meaning of the 4th rule, and, that being so, the appeal must be allowed.

Re WOODS; GABELLINI v. WOODS.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Appeal allowed.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

(Before KEKEWICH, J.)

Re WOODS; GABELLINI v. WOODS. (a)

Will—Construction—Wasting security—Notional conversion—Tenant for life and remainderman—Rate of interest—Interest upon surplus income.

Where there is a notional conversion of a wasting security, as in Meyer v. Simonsen (5 De G. & Sm. 723), interest thereon should now be allowed to the tenant for life at the rate of 3 per cent. only.

The surplus income of the wasting security, after providing for the 3 per cent., goes to capital, but the interest thereon to the tenant for life.

MATHEW CHARLES WOODS, who died on the 20th July 1894, by his will, dated the 1st May 1893, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of to trustees upon trust to sell, call in, and convert the same, and after payment thereof of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies, to stand possessed of the residue upon trust as to one equal third part for his only son Claude Charles Edward Woods absolutely, and as to another equal third part upon trust to invest the same in the mode provided by the will and stand possessed thereof for his daughter Mildred Sybella Woods for her life with remainders over in favour of her children as therein set out, and as to the remaining equal third part upon trust for his daughter Lucy Eva Woods upon the like trusts to those declared in favour of Mildred Woods and her children. There were also cross-remainders over between the beneficiaries as therein set out. And the testator directed that his trustees might postpone the sale and conversion of any part of his real and personal estate so long as they should think fit notwithstanding that the same might be of leasehold tenure or otherwise of a wearing out or perishable nature, and might retain any part of his estate in the same state of investment as the same might be at his death, and as regards any real or leasehold property remaining unsold might let and manage the same according to their absolute discretion. And the testator directed that all moneys liable to be invested under his will might, in addition to any other mode authorised for the investment of trust funds, be invested in the purchase of stocks, funds, or securities of any British colony or dependency, or in the purchase of debentures or preference or ordinary stock or fully paid-up preference or ordinary stock of any railway or other company in the United Kingdom, or upon the bonds and securities of any municipal or other corporation, commissioners, or other public body authorised by Parliament to borrow money, or upon deposit with any bank, or in the purchase of any freehold property of inheritance in England or Scotland, with liberty to his trustees to accept such title or evidence of title as they should think fit.

There was no provision in the will as to the payment of the income of the testator's property during the postponement of conversion.

The residuary estate of the testator included (inter alia) a share of mining royalties on coal received under mining leases of property in Durham.

Under the power of postponement given them by the will the trustees had not converted the same, and they periodically received the testator's share therein.

This was a summons taken out by the two daughters of the testator (to which the testator's son and the trustees of the will were made defendants) asking for a declaration that, according to the true construction of the will of the testator, each of the applicants was entitled for her life or until conversion to receive out of the mining royalties received each year 4 per cent. per annum on one-third of the estimated capital value, as at the date of the testator's death, of the mining royalties.

It was admitted that the trustees had acted properly in postponing conversion, and that the case fell within the principle of Brown v. Gellatly (17 L. T. Rep. 131; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 751) and Meyer v. Simonsen (5 De G. & Sm. 723)—viz., that when wasting securities are permitted to be retained they must be valued as at the testator's death, and a fixed rate of interest thereon allowed to the tenant for life, but the question was raised as to whether that rate ought to be 4 per cent. or 3 per cent. only.

Whinney for the plaintiffs.—We should be allowed 4 per cent. That was the rate in Gibson v. Bott (7 Ves. 97), in Caldecott v. Caldecott (1 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 737), in Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.), and in Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.), and the two latter cases were approved in Wentworth v. Wentworth (81 L. T. Rep. 632; (1900) A. C. 163). See also

O. L. Clare for the testator's son.—The tenants for life should only be allowed 3 per cent. In Re Lynch-Blosse; Rickards v. Lynch-Blosse (1899) W. N. 27) future interest was reduced to 3 per cent. In the parallel class of cases, those concerning apportionment of recovered assets the rate formerly was 4 per cent.:

But by the latest decision of Rowlls v. Bebb (82 L. T. Rep. 633; (1900) 2 Ch. 107) it has been reduced to 3 per cent. See also Whinney replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question what rate of interest shall be allowed has in many cases been exercising the minds of many judges in recent years. Unfortunately, there is not at present any definite rule which guides the court, and I am afraid that cannot be obtained except by steps—that is to say, by one judge following another, or by some authoritative decision in the Court of Appeal. Unfortunately, the cases in which the question arises have so much differed one from another that it does not follow necessarily that, because one rate is adopted in one case, it should therefore be adopted in another. The class of cases in which it has generally arisen are cases that are often referred to as the Chesterfield cases, because there is a reported case of that name, Re Chesterfield (Earl's) Trusts (ubi sup.), before Chitty, J., in which he, not really giving a judgment himself, adopted a decision in Beavan v. Beavan (49 L. T. Rep. 263n; 24 Ch. Div. 649n), and, after all, as I have had occasion to point out before, the whole law is settled by a decision of Turner and Knight-Bruce, L.J.J. in Turner v. Newport (2 Ph. 14). Now, we call those the Chesterfield cases. That particular class of cases came before the Court of Appeal in Rowlls v. Bebb (ubi sup.), and, with regard to that, I must take it as settled and binding on me, even if I were disposed to differ from it, that in future 3 per cent., and not 4 per cent., should be allowed. I will read what Lord Lindley, then Master of the Rolls, said in giving the judgment of the court. I need not state the circumstances, because everyone now knows what is meant by a case coming within the Chesterfield case. Lord Lindley said: "The only other question is whether interest should be calculated at 3 per cent. or at 4 per cent. I have not looked at the Judgments Act, but I think I am right in saying that it provides that a judgment debt shall bear interest at 4 per cent. Of course, we cannot alter that. And I think the rules provide that legacies shall bear interest at 4 per cent." (He does not add that he cannot alter that.) "But I know of no rule which applies in terms to such a case as this, or even to the making good of breaches of trust. Having regard to the rate of interest which can now be obtained on securities upon which trustees may invest, it appears to me that, in a case of this kind, even apart from the view taken by Kekewich, J. in Re Goodenough (ubi sup.), that 3 per cent., not 4, ought to be the rate of interest." That is a very strong expression of opinion on the part of the Master of the Rolls delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, not only that 3 per cent. ought to be substituted for 4 per cent. in that class of case, but he intimates in tolerably clear language, to my mind, that 3 per cent. should be substituted for 4 per cent. wherever the statute or rules do not interfere to prevent it. That seems to me to be founded on good sense for this reason. Mr. Whinney referred, as one of his first cases, to Gibson v. Bott (ubi sup.), which was decided by Lord Eldon in 1802. If 4 per cent. was right in 1802, it does not seem to me it can possibly be so now. If it was right and fair between the parties at that time to charge 4 per cent., it seems to me it must be right and fair to charge something less now. I think that might fairly be said with regard to the later times when Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) was decided in 1867, for ever since then the rate of interest has fallen enormously. Perhaps it is an unhappy moment to discuss a question of that kind, for I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that everyone in court knows as well as I do—perhaps better—that during the last twelve months a very severe fall of first-class securities has taken place, with the result, as was pointed out by Mr. Whinney, that it is possible to purchase first-class securities now so as to yield a much greater rate of interest than was possible a little time ago. But one cannot vary the rate from day to day, or month to month, or year to year because trust securities happen to go up or down; you must have some general rule, and I venture to say, what no one can doubt, that there has been a great fall, and that, although there may be a temporary rise, the fall in the rate of interest at the present moment has taken place, and will in the future be maintained. If Gibson v. Bott (ubi sup.) and Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) were rightly decided, that rate of interest must be wrong now, and some alteration should be made. Now, is there any such fair guide in cases of this kind as there is with regard to judgments and legacies—that is to say, any rule laid down by any statute, or by the actual written rules of the court found in the Annual Practice, or by any rule founded on decisions following one another and constituting what I may call the unwritten law of the court? I do not think there is. The only near approach to recognition of a rule is the passage which Mr. Whinney read to me out of Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.) before the Privy Council. There, no doubt, Lord Macnaghten, who gave, not his judgment, but the judgment of the Privy Council, says: "It has been the practice of the court . . . to allow the tenant for life . . . a sum equal to 4 per cent. on such value." But he was not discussing this question there; the Privy Council were not concerned whether it ought to be 3 per cent., 4 per cent., 5 per cent., or anything else; all they were discussing was what were the equitable terms as between a tenant for life and remainderman, and Lord Macnaghten mentions 4 per cent. as being what followed from the judgments in Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) and Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.), which he adopted for the purpose of illustrating the principle with which the Privy Council were dealing, and that does not seem to me to be an authority on the point at all. Now, the case I have to deal with is this: A testator possessed of mining royalties, which are a wasting security and a security also realising, as they have in this case, very large profits, has directed them to be sold, but he has given power to his trustees of postponement; and the trustees are to be justified in every case in resting on their power of postponement and keeping the property in specie. Unfortunately, he has given no direction as to payment of the royalties until sale to the tenant for life or any portion of them. The result is that the trustees are unable by their own selves to give him anything; and in consequence of that the question has come before the court. It was decided in Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) and in many other cases (I take Brown v. Gellatly, ubi sup., only as an example) that the proper thing to do is to value such securities as at the time when they ought to have been converted, if the direction for conversion were peremptory, immediately after the testator's death if he so said, or at the expiration of a year if he said nothing, or probably some other convenient time; and, taking the value at that time, then to give the tenant for life interest on that value in lieu of royalty, and that is paid out of the royalty; he takes such proportion of the royalty as is equivalent to interest taken at a certain rate. That is what has been called in many cases a "notional conversion"—you do on paper what you cannot do in fact. After all, it is a mere estimate, because one of the reasons for not converting is because you cannot ascertain the real value. The market may at the moment be in a bad state for realisation, or there may be a proper anticipation of alteration of the market at a future time; but for some reason it is impossible for any careful man actually to convert. Therefore you must go through an estimating process, which is called a notional conversion, and find out, as far as you can, the value of the royalties for the purpose, and considering, of course, what is the length of the lease of the colliery, if it depends upon a lease, and also how long it will take to work it out, if it depends on that, and so forth; but you have to ascertain the amount of the royalties as corpus, and, having got that, you pay the tenant for life some rate of interest on the value so ascertained. How are you to do that? How are you to fix the rate of interest? It seems to me you have to do what is fair between the tenant for life and the remainderman. The tenant for life was not intended to have the whole royalty, and the remainderman was not intended to have the whole proceeds of sale. I have not been able to find any case in which any judge has said how he arrived at the 4 per cent., or any other rate, or perhaps I ought not to say "any other rate," because it has always been 4 per cent.; but if there had been conversion in fact, and the money had been well invested in trust securities, it would formerly have realised about 4 per cent. Of course it was impossible to say in what particular securities they would have invested. A judge might have said, if it were right to condescend to such details: "The notional conversion would realise 10,000*l.*; invest 5000*l.* of that in one security, 3000*l.* in another security, and 2000*l.* in another security, with interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ on one, 3*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* on another, and so on"—and in that way work it out and bring out 4 per cent. or something less. But no judge has done that. The judge has struck an average (as I understand the cases, they must have done that), and said: "If you were to invest that sum in trust securities, you would be fortunate if you got 4 per cent." That is the rule. Now, if that is the principle on which judges have proceeded, it seems to me they ought now to say: "You must strike an average, and you will be as fortunate in getting 3 per cent. nowadays as in the past you would have been if you got 4 per cent." The only recent case within the principle of Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) is the case of Re Lynch-Blosse (ubi sup.), before Mr. Justice Stirling, and that seems to me to hit this point exactly. There the learned judge had to determine not only what should be given in the future, but what should be allowed in the past. It was a matter entirely for his judicial discretion, and, if I may say so, I think he acted with great judgment in allowing 4 per cent. for the past. But when he comes to deal with the future, he takes a different line entirely, and says: "From this time forward you will only get 3 per cent., because there would be nothing beyond that if these were actual instead of notional conversion, and you had to take the income from actual investments on that conversion. Now, I find here that I am not hampered by any of the cases. They seem to me to point to an alteration of the old rule where the statute or rules do not prevent the alteration. So far as I have any authority at all, subject to one dictum of Lord Macnaghten which I think I have perfectly explained, everything seems to me to point to 3 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. I should be very glad if the matter could be discussed and some rule laid down; but the point having come before me, and it being my duty to decide it as well as I can, I think that, in cases within the rule which was laid down in Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.), 3 per cent. should now take the place of 4 per cent. I say nothing about special cases, or cases where 4 per cent. or more should be allowed—cases where there has been something more than innocent breach of trust, or where trustees have acted wrongly for their own benefit. Cases of that kind must be dealt with from an entirely different point of view. I am dealing with how those entitled to the corpus and those who are entitled to the income have to be provided for, and where there are innocent parties all round, and I have to do as well as I can between them, and I think the rate should be at 3 per cent. only. I am encouraged in that view by knowing, as I do, and as we all do, that in all large actuarial valuations at the present day 3 per cent. is taken as the proper rate of interest; and I should not have said so quite so strongly, if it had not been that only yesterday I was dealing with a very large estate which had been actuarially valued for the purpose of division, and in which all the calculations were based on that footing.

A further question was then raised as to the application of the surplus income of the royalties, and the summons was amended to ask for a declaration that the surplus income of each year ought to be invested in securities authorised by the will, and that each of the applicants was entitled for her life to receive the income of such securities.

This came on to be heard on the 19th Jan.

Whinney for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to the income of the invested surplus:

Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.).

This result follows from the decision in Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.), although not expressly decided there. See also Re Hill; Hill v. Hill, 45 L. T. Rep. 126.

O. L. Clare for the testator's son.—Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.) is a different case. Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.) does not decide this question, nor does the result contended for by the plaintiffs follow from it. If their contention prevails, the tenants for life must get more than they would get if conversion had actually taken place, and a notional conversion is intended to place the parties in the same position as they would have been if actual conversion had taken place. Therefore not only the surplus royalties themselves, but also the income to be derived from them, should be invested as capital.

Jan. 19.—KEKEWICH, J.—This case was before the court last week on the question of whether 3 per cent. or 4 per cent. should be allowed to the tenant for life, the case being one of this character. The testator had directed the realisation of certain mining royalties, but he gave to his trustees ample power of postponement. The mining royalties could not conveniently be realised, and it was admitted on all hands that the trustees had exercised and were exercising discreetly the powers of postponement. The question then arose what ought to be given to the tenant for life—that is to say, to the person entitled to the actual income of the proceeds of realisation when realisation ultimately took place. It was admitted that there was no question as to whether the case fell within the well-known authorities of Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) and Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.) as applied by Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.) to property of this character; but the only question was whether 3 per cent. or 4 per cent. should be allowed, and I decided that the tenant for life was entitled to 3 per cent. only. Then arose this question: This is a notional conversion—that is to say, the royalties are directed to be valued as at the death of the testator, and, a certain sum being ascertained in that way, the tenant for life will receive interest at 3 per cent. on the sum so ascertained, and that will be paid out of the mining royalties received, leaving a large balance. That balance must be invested, and the accumulations of that balance will become capital of the testator's estate. About that there is no question, but a question does arise as to what is to be done with the income of the invested balance. It is contended, on the one hand, that that income is for the benefit of those who are entitled to the residuary estate itself, and, on the other hand, that it is income of the testator's estate and is therefore payable to the tenant for life. It is somewhat strange that the point has never been decided neatly and cleanly. Now, in the first place I have to consider whether there is any distinction between a case where the testator has directed conversion and a case where, the testator having been silent on the point, but having settled a wasting security, that security must, according to the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (7 Ves 137), be realised and converted. I think there can be no logical distinction between the two. In this case the testator settled mining royalties, and they must be realised according to the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (ubi sup.) unless the testator has expressly directed that they are not to be realised. It is, of course, quite competent to a testator either to leave the court to act under the decision in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (ubi sup.) or to direct a conversion himself. But, whatever is done, it comes round to this. If you have property which ought to be converted, but which, for reasons which convince everybody and which are for the benefit of the estate, you think ought not to be converted immediately, then, according to Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.), the tenant for life must have a fair equivalent, and that is done by valuing the estate and giving the tenant for life interest at a certain rate upon that valuation. Now, is that intended to be the whole of the benefit which the tenant for life is entitled to receive? If there is actual conversion, then the tenant for life is entitled to receive the income from the whole. But if there is postponement, is there not in substance a conversion from year to year? Is not that balance of the mining royalties which the tenant for life does not receive really a realisation from year to year of a part of the estate? Is not that balance received by the trustees from year to year a part of the capital of the estate? And, if that is so, ought it not to be treated as capital and to be invested, and in logic ought not the tenant for life to have the income of that? But this question must be considered, not only upon logical principle, but upon the authorities, and they, I think, seem to be in favour of the tenant for life's getting that advantage. Brown v. Gellatly (ubi sup.) was expressly decided upon the authority of Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.), and in Meyer v. Simonsen (ubi sup.) the tenant for life did get interest on the invested surplus—that is to say, that part of the rents which were not received by him as income but was invested. In Wentworth v. Wentworth (ubi sup.) I think the same result follows, although the order of the Privy Council as set out does not give a direction to that effect. The will there is stated in the judgment of the Privy Council, delivered by Lord Macnaghten, at the beginning of the judgment. The will contained an elaborate settlement of the property. The testator directed accumulation for twenty-one years, and that accumulation stood. The question then arose as to what happened after the termination of the twenty-one years, and their Lordships held that, as regards that, there must be what is called a notional conversion in order to find out what was a fair equivalent to be paid to the tenant for life, and they directed the balance to be treated as part of the testator's residuary estate, and to be accumulated and invested accordingly. Their Lordships did not construe the rest of the will; they decided only the one question and they left the administration of that residue to the persons to whom according to law it was intrusted, as is set out in their judgment. According to that decision, if the tenant for life was entitled to the income of the residuary estate, he would have the income of the invested balance. Their Lordships only said that it was to go into residue, but it follows that those who were to take the income of the residue would take the income of the invested balance which was to go into the residue. It was not necessary to give directions for that. There is nothing, therefore, in that judgment inconsistent with the contention that, if there were a tenant for life of the residue, he would be entitled to the income of the invested surplus. I think, therefore, that authority and principle coalesce, and that these tenants for life are entitled to the income of the invested surplus.

Practice—Administration—Common order for administration against executor—Subsequent action by same plaintiff charging wilful default and fraud—No evidence of fresh information acquired since date of common order—Leave of the court.

A plaintiff who has obtained a common order for administration of an estate against the executor may obtain the leave of the court to bring a fresh action charging (inter alia) wilful default against the executor without proving that he did not acquire the information on which he founds his fresh action in time to utilise it in the former proceeding in which he obtained the common order for administration, proof of which was required in the case of Laming v. Gee (40 L. T. Rep. 33; 10 Ch. Div. 715), on the plaintiff, who was an undischarged bankrupt, giving security to the satisfaction of the master for the executor's costs of the fresh action.

ALEXANDER H. KURTZ, the testator in the proceedings, died on the 3rd July 1902, leaving the defendant Henry Wren Henderson his sole executor, who proved his will on the 1st April 1903.

The testator, who was in bad health, was at the date of his death, and had been for two years prior thereto, living with Edward Watts and Mary Elizabeth Watts, the latter of whom claimed that the testator was indebted to her for money advanced to him, and also that she was entitled to certain articles of furniture given her by the testator in his lifetime.

The defendant Henry W. Henderson also claimed to be a creditor of the testator for money due to him on mortgage of the testator's furniture.

On the 6th July 1903 a deed of compromise was made between Mary Elizabeth Watts, Edward Watts, and Henry W. Henderson whereby their claims were settled and certain articles of furniture, the property of the deceased, divided among them.

On the 10th July 1903 the plaintiff Horace Emerson, who claimed to be a creditor of the estate of the testator, took out an originating summons against Henry W. Henderson, as the executor of the testator, for the administration of his estate, and obtained a common order for administration of the estate on the 10th Aug. 1903.

On the 29th Sept. 1903 the plaintiff Horace Emerson on behalf of himself and other creditors of the testator commenced an action by writ against Henry W. Henderson, Edward Watts, and Mary Elizabeth Watts, claiming (1) administration of the testator's real and personal estate; (2) that an account might be taken against the executor on the footing of wilful default; (3) that the deed of compromise might be set aside as fraudulent and void; (4) an injunction to restrain the defendants from dealing with any of the chattels mentioned in the deed; (5) a receiver; and (6) costs.

This was a summons taken out by the plaintiff Horace Emerson against the defendant Henry W. Henderson on the 10th Nov. 1903 asking for the leave of the court to bring the fresh action.

Eve, K.C., M.P., and E. P. Hewitt for the summons.—The plaintiff desires to bring the fresh action to charge the defendant executor with wilful default, and to have the deed of compromise entered into by him with the other defendants set aside as fraudulent and void.

Boome for the defendant Henry W. Henderson.—The plaintiff has already obtained a common order for administration against the defendant executor, and in such a case the court will not give him leave to bring a fresh action against the defendant executor charging him with wilful default, unless the plaintiff proves that he did not become aware of the facts on which he founds his fresh action in time to utilise them in his former proceeding:

Laming v. Gee, 40 L. T. Rep. 33; 10 Ch. Div. 715.

Besides, the plaintiff is an undischarged bankrupt.

EADY, J.—Will the plaintiff give security to the satisfaction of the master to cover the defendant executor's costs of the fresh action?

Eve, K.C.—Yes.

EADY, J.—On the plaintiff's giving security to the satisfaction of the master to cover the defendant executor's costs of the fresh action, I give him leave to proceed with it.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the petty sessional division of Newmarket, in the county of Suffolk, upon a prosecution for the recovery of a penalty of 20*l.* for employing eight male servants with licences for seven only.

An information was preferred on the 27th Feb. 1903 by Edward Horan (the appellant), an officer of Inland Revenue, who prosecuted by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14 (the Revenue Act 1869), against Alfred Hayhoe (the respondent), of Newmarket, for that he the respondent, on the 22nd Jan. 1903, at Newmarket, did employ eight male servants, for the employing of each of whom a licence was required by the statute in that behalf, and being a greater number of male servants than he was authorised to employ by any licence or licences granted under the statute, the respondent being then and there authorised by a licence or licences under the statute to employ seven male servants only, contrary to the form of the statute, whereby the respondent had for such offence forfeited the sum of 20*l.*

The information was heard by the justices in petty sessions on the 10th March 1903, and upon such hearing they dismissed the information with costs against the appellant.

At the hearing before the justices no witnesses were called on behalf of the appellant or respondent, but the case was argued upon admissions signed by the solicitors of the parties.

The admissions were as follows: That of the eight persons described in the information and summons the seven persons first named (that is, all except Thomas Baldwin) were employed as stablemen, and that a male servant's licence was required in respect of each of them. That licences for seven male servants had during the present year and previously to the date of the information been obtained by the defendant and were applicable to these seven servants. That Thomas Baldwin was bound to the defendant for a period of seven years under a contract dated the 25th May 1897, of which a copy was annexed to and formed part of this case. That Thomas Baldwin was employed for the greater portion of each day in the performance of duties which would, if he were merely engaged otherwise than under the contract before mentioned, render a licence necessary for him as a male servant. That the terms and covenants of the contract had since the 25th May 1897 been faithfully and honestly carried out and fulfilled by the parties thereto respectively. That the defendant was the employer of all the persons above mentioned.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended: (1) That the contract, dated the 25th May 1897, had for its main and primary, if not for its sole, object the hiring and service of Thomas Baldwin the younger therein mentioned, and not his teaching, and, consequently, that Thomas Baldwin was a male servant within the meaning of the statute and not an apprentice. (2) That even if the contract was an indenture of apprenticeship, Thomas Baldwin the younger was a male servant within the meaning of the statute.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the contract was an indenture of apprenticeship, and that Thomas Baldwin the younger was an apprentice, and was not a male servant within the meaning of the statute.

The justices found as a fact that the contract was one of apprenticeship, and they were of opinion that Thomas Baldwin the younger was not a servant within the meaning of the statute, but an apprentice, and that the contention of the respondent was correct, and they accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts the justices came to a correct determination in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

The indenture was made on the 25th May 1897 between Thomas Baldwin the younger, son of Thomas Baldwin the elder, cabinetmaker (therein designated as the said apprentice), of the first part, Thomas Baldwin the elder (therein designated as the said father) of the second part, and Alfred Hayhoe, of Newmarket, trainer of horses (therein designated as the said master), of the third part, and witnessed that

In consideration of the covenants, agreements, and things herein contained he the said apprentice doth with the consent of the said father (testified by his executing these presents) hereby put, place, and bind himself apprentice to the said master to serve him from the twenty-fifth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, for and during the term of seven years from thence next ensuing and fully to be completed and ended, during all which time he the said apprentice will faithfully, diligently, and honestly serve him the said master and obey and perform all his lawful commands whenever and wherever required to be performed and observe all reasonable regulations which the said master may from time to time deem necessary for the proper discipline of his business and establishment so far as such regulations relate to apprentices. And will not absent himself from the services of the said master without his leave nor divulge any of the secrets of the said master connected with his business or otherwise, but will keep and preserve the same. And will not unduly or negligently spend or waste any of the moneys, effects, goods, or chattels of the said master which shall at any time be intrusted or placed in his hands or custody either by the said master or by any other person or persons on his account during the said term. And will well and truly from time to time account for, deliver, or pay to the said master, his executors, administrators, or assigns, all such moneys and other things as the said apprentice shall receive, have, or be intrusted with, or which shall come to his hands or possession for or on account of the said master, or for or on account of the services of or work done by the said apprentice during the said term. And also will in all matters and things whatsoever during the said term demean and behave himself as a good, true, and faithful apprentice ought to do. And the said master doth hereby covenant with the said father in manner following—that is to say, that he the said master will at the request of the said apprentice and with such consent as aforesaid take and receive the said apprentice for and during the said term of seven years to be computed from the said twenty-fifth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven. And also will during the said term (provided always that and only so long as the said apprentice performs and observes all the promises, matters, and things hereinbefore contained to be performed and observed on his part) to the best of his power, knowledge, and ability teach and instruct the said apprentice in the arts of a training groom which he useth and of riding as connected therewith and find and provide for him the said apprentice good, proper, and sufficient meat, drink, and lodging. And also will (subject to the same proviso) find and provide the said apprentice proper and sufficient clothing as and by way of wages during the first and second year of the said term, and will pay to the said apprentice as and by way of wages during the remainder of the said term after the rates following—that is to say, the sum of eight pounds during the third year thereof, the sum of ten pounds during the fourth year thereof, the sum of twelve pounds during the fifth year thereof, the sum of fourteen pounds during the sixth year thereof, and the sum of fourteen pounds during the last year thereof. And also will pay or allow to the said apprentice one half of any moneys which shall be received by the said master for fees earned by the riding of the said apprentice in races or trials after deducting a proportionate share of the expenses (if any) that may be incurred in collecting the same. . . .

And then there were certain covenants by the father.

The Revenue Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 14) provides:

Sect. 18. On and after the first day of January 1870 there shall be granted, charged, levied, and paid, for the use of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in and throughout Great Britain, under and subject to the provisions and regulations in this Act contained, the following duties—that is to say: For every male servant 15s. . . . And such duties respectively shall be paid annually upon licences to be taken out under the provisions of this Act by the person who shall employ the servant. . . .

Sect. 10, sub-sect. 3. The term "male servant" means and includes any male servant employed either wholly or partially in any of the following capacities—that is to say: Maitre d'hôtel, house steward, master of the horse, groom of the chambers, valet de chambre, butler, under-butler, clerk of the kitchen, confectioner, cook, house porter, footman, page, waiter, coachman, groom, postilion, stable boy or helper in the stables, gardener, under-gardener, park-keeper, gamekeeper, under-gamekeeper, huntsman and whipper-in, or in any capacity involving the duties of any of the above descriptions of servants, by whatever style the person acting in such capacity may be called.

Sir Edward Carson (S.-G.) (Rowlatt with him) for the appellant.—The only difference between the seven persons employed as stablemen and Baldwin is that there was this contract in Baldwin's case and not in the case of the others. They were all equally performing the duties of stablemen, and therefore we have it that Baldwin was performing the duties of stableman, and the submission for the Crown is that under the Act, as he was performing the duties of stableman, he was a stableman, and a male servant within the definition in the Act. The Act does not refer to apprentices at all, but defines "male servant." At the very commencement of this apprenticeship contract it is said that this person shall faithfully serve the master in those capacities. What difference can it make as regards this Act that, in addition to serving him, he is an apprentice? If he serves him as an apprentice he is none the less serving him, and he is doing the work of a servant and receiving wages as such, although, no doubt, he may have become that servant for the purpose of learning his business, and although the master may have undertaken to teach him that particular business. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The doubt in my mind is that apprenticeships have been known for many hundreds of years, and I suppose there are stamps on apprenticeship deeds, and one wonders why the word "apprentice" was not used as well as "servant" if the Legislature meant to include apprentices.] It was unnecessary to do so, because "servant" includes apprentice. In books on master and servant, servants are treated in that class with apprentices. Thus in Blackstone's Commentaries (chapter on Master and Servant) it is said: "Another species of servants are called apprentices (from apprendre, to learn), and are usually bound for a term of years . . . to serve their master, and be maintained and instructed by them." This person is therefore a servant, and the case is covered by the Act. It was contended that in a previous Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 90) apprentices were for the first time omitted, but, if we trace through the previous Acts in which they were mentioned, those Acts show that apprentices were servants within the meaning of the prior Acts, and they were specially mentioned to avoid coming under an exemption which is to be found in all the previous Acts for servants in trades or callings by which the master got his living; and when that general exemption was dropped it became unnecessary to put in the exception as regards the apprentices, and that is how they came to be left out subsequently. When the exception was removed, the Legislature no longer put in the word "apprentice" as well as "servant." The first Act dealing with this matter is 17 Geo. 3, c. 39, and sect. 1 of that Act imposes a duty in respect of servants generally, and sect. 2 provides certain exemptions in respect of certain servants. Sect. 4 refers to apprentices, and says that apprentices are not to be exempt as such from the tax on servants, except apprentices imposed upon masters by magistrates. That Act shows that the word "servant" was used in the broadest sense as including apprentices. Then the next Acts in order are 19 Geo. 3, c. 31; 21 Geo. 3, c. 31; 25 Geo. 3, c. 43; 38 Geo. 3, c. 41; 42 Geo. 3, c. 37; 43 Geo. 3, c. 161; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 90 (in which the term "apprentices" was for the first time omitted), and the present Act, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14. These Acts all show that "servant" includes apprentices.

Scott Fox, K.C. (T. F. Hobson with him) for the respondent.—If the contention for the Crown is right, why was the word "servant" put in if it was intended to have no meaning beyond that of the word "person"? The old Acts, which have been referred to, taxed all sorts of persons, but generally excluded traders. The scope of the recent legislation is to tax merely servants who are employed, so to speak, as appendages of a household or establishment, while the former Acts included a number of servants as well as servants of this class. By the word "servant" it was intended to distinguish the status of the person, and the present Act imposes a tax merely on servants and not a tax upon apprentices. To bring the case within the Act, two qualifications are necessary. First, the man must be a servant; and, secondly, he must perform the duties which are enumerated or similar duties, by whatever name he may be called. In the earlier Act of 1853 the word "person" is distinguished from the word "servant" in sched. C, and when the Act means to include apprentices it uses the word "person." Here the justices have found in fact that this was a contract of apprenticeship, and the main object of such a contract is to receive instruction. This finding is most important, having regard to the contentions for the Crown before the justices. The criterion put forward by the Crown was whether this was bona fide for the purpose of teaching and learning or merely for the purpose of getting a stableman, and upon that question of fact the justices found in the respondent's favour. The meaning of the word "servant" in this Act is the ordinary meaning according to the use of the word in the English language—that is, a person whose business it is to serve, and towards whom the master has no business of teaching. Upon all the earlier Acts it was perfectly clear whether apprentices were intended to be taxed, and no doubtful question was left as to whether an apprentice who also did some service for the purpose of learning his trade was a servant within the meaning of the Taxing Act. There are two things which have to be determined—the nature of the duties to be performed, and the nature of the relationship to the master. In both respects the boy in question was an apprentice, and if there be any doubt, as this is a taxing Act, it ought to be in favour of the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is not, in my opinion, sufficient to bring the particular employé in question within the Taxing Act. It is, I think, a wholesome principle, which has often been recognised, that Taxing Acts must be distinct and fairly reasonably clear as to what are intended to be taxed before such things can be taxed. The general impression produced upon my mind by the earlier statutes which have been referred to is that the Legislature did think it necessary to insert provisions to bring apprentices within an enumeration of servants practically identical with the enumeration of servants in this Act. For example, to cite an instance, one of the Acts says: "The aforesaid duties shall extend to apprentices other than apprentices who were compulsorily forced upon the masters." Therefore, as far as the earlier legislation helps us at all—and I do not think it helps us very much—it does not assist the contention of the Solicitor-General for the Crown. If we look at the statute of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 90 (the Land Tax Redemption (Investment) Act 1853), which is for this purpose practically the same as 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, I think there was a reason for using the word "servant," and that under ordinary circumstances the person to be taxed was to have the relation of servant to the master. That, however, is not conclusive, because, as the Solicitor-General has properly pointed out, though the person may be called by another name, yet if he does wholly or partially perform those duties he may still come within the word "servant." That leads me to the final point as to what this contract was. The contract is not one which is necessary for the mere hiring of a groom, and although, as the Solicitor-General said, it was in the interest of the master, so that the boy might not go away if he became a good rider, there is quite as much to be said on the other side, that it was in the interest of the servant so that he might be kept a sufficient time to enable him to learn his work properly, if he turned out to be slow to learn or not industrious, or not the most praiseworthy apprentice in the world. I think the way in which the magistrates have put the matter is right, that they regard this contract as a contract of apprenticeship, meaning that the real object of the contract was that the boy should be taught to be a riding groom, and not merely to be a stable boy, and to be employed for seven years as a stable boy. That being so, I think the decision is right, and that the words of this Taxing Act are not sufficient to bring a boy employed under this agreement within the charging section simply because in the ordinary course of his training he does what he must do in order to learn his business—namely, perform the duties of a groom for a considerable part of the day. I therefore think the appeal ought not to be allowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—It seems to me that, on the whole, in construing this Taxing Act the contract of apprenticeship may not improperly be relied upon as supporting the decision of the magistrates. To bring a case within the statute we have to find a person who is a male, who is doing certain classes of work, and who is certainly doing that work as a servant to a master. Supposing one were to ask that question of an apprentice, he would say: "I am not a servant; I am an apprentice." He would not mean that as an apprentice he might not be doing this class of work to some extent, but he would mean that his relationship to his employer is one, not of service, but of apprenticeship, carrying with it special incidents and as a particular and distinctive incident that of being entitled to education as well as to nurture or wages which a master pays his servant. Unless the Act makes it clear that it not merely includes a male person who is employed in these capacities, but also includes a person who is an apprentice as distinguished from a servant by the nature of the contract between him and the master, I think it fails to include persons in the position of this young man in this case.

REX v. GILLESPIE AND OTHERS; Ex parte OVERSEERS OF WEST HAM. (a)

Poor rate—Recovery—Distress warrant—Tender of part of rate in court—Refusal of magistrate to issue distress warrant for whole rate—Jurisdiction of magistrate so to refuse—Poor Relief Act 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2), s. 4—Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14), ss. 1, 5, 8, and forms in schedule.

Where, upon an application by overseers to a magistrate under the Distress for Rates Act 1849 for a distress warrant for rates, the ratepayer against whom the application is made tenders in court before the magistrate a part of the rate

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the magistrate is not bound to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate, but has a discretion to issue the distress warrant for the balance only, after deducting the amount so tendered in court.

RULE calling on the stipendiary magistrate for the borough of West Ham and Messrs. Boardman and Sons to show cause why the magistrate should not issue his warrant to levy by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of Messrs. Boardman and Sons the sum of 441*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, being the amount of a certain rate duly made by the overseers of the poor of the parish of West Ham.

The rate in question was duly made, and was payable by the respondents, Messrs. Clement Boardman and Sons, in respect of certain premises in the parish of West Ham of which Messrs. Boardman and Sons were occupiers.

The facts were stated as follows in the affidavit made and filed by the learned magistrate.

A complaint by John Kendall, an assistant overseer of the parish of West Ham, was made to the magistrate on the 15th July 1903 that (amongst others) Messrs. Clement Boardman and Sons, being persons duly rated to the poor in a rate made on the 28th April 1903 in the sum of 441*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, had not paid that sum, but had refused and neglected to do so. Thereupon a summons was issued to Messrs. Boardman and Sons to appear at the West Ham Police-court on the 22nd July 1903 to show cause why they had not paid and neglected or refused to pay the rate.

On the 22nd July Mr. John Boardman on behalf of Messrs. Boardman and Sons appeared before the magistrate at the court. The assistant overseer produced the book containing the poor rate with the allowance by the justices, and proved the demand and nonpayment for seven days previous to the summons. No objection was taken to the rate or to the formalities, but in cross-examination the assistant overseer admitted that Messrs. Boardman had tendered 416*l.* on account of the rate by leaving that amount at the rate office, which amount was subsequently sent back to Messrs. Boardman.

The assistant overseer also stated that he did not think he ever refused part payment of a rate before; Messrs. Boardman's ground of objection to pay the balance was that they disapproved of the recent Education Act.

At the magistrate's suggestion Messrs. Boardman made another tender of the 416*l.* in court, but the assistant overseer refused to accept the same. Thereupon the magistrate refused to issue a distress warrant for more than 25*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, the balance.

Sect. 8 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14 (the Distress for Rates Act 1849) provides as follows:

And whereas it may be convenient, and save expense and litigation, if forms to be used for the purpose of levying the sums aforesaid should be given: Be it enacted, that the forms in the schedule to this Act contained, or forms to the same or the like effect, shall be deemed good, valid, and sufficient in law.

A reference to forms A (2), B, and C (1) shows that it is necessary to state in each that the respective persons "have not respectively paid the said sums or any part thereof, but have respectively refused so to do." The magistrate was of opinion that it was clearly contemplated by the statute that a ratepayer "to save expense and litigation" might pay and the overseer receive a portion of the rate, and, further, that Messrs. Boardman and Sons had not refused payment of the rate, but only a part thereof, having in fact by their tender shown their willingness to pay the greater part thereof—namely, 416*l.*—which the overseers neglected and refused to accept.

The magistrate was further of opinion that, although acting ministerially, it was never contemplated that he should issue a distress warrant for 441*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, with the consequent increase of expense to the ratepayers (amounting to over 20*l.*) in executing it, when 416*l.* in cash was to be had for the lifting in court and outside the court; that this sum of 25*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* was the only sum remaining unpaid, and, moreover, the only sum which Messrs. Boardman had neglected and refused to pay.

The magistrate deemed it his duty as a magistrate to ensure payment to the overseers of the full amount of their rate, and this he considered he did effectually by enabling them to take 416*l.* in cash and granting them a distress warrant for the balance of 25*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* He at the same time avoided burdening the ratepayers with extra expense, which the statute seemed to him to enjoin.

The magistrate further stated that he had sat as deputy police magistrate and as police magistrate at that court for over fourteen years, and during that time had heard many thousands of poor rate summonses, and it was of very frequent occurrence that the assistant overseer had asked him to order distress warrants for less amounts than those for which the summonses were issued, payment on account having been accepted by the overseers. He had never personally known a single instance in which such payment had been refused, and he verily believed that until this question of the education rate arose payment on account of poor rates had always been accepted.

In the affidavit by the superintendent assistant overseer, at whose instance the rule was granted on behalf of the overseers of the parish, it was stated (amongst other things) that the rate in question included the education rate for the parish; that Mr. John Boardman had, for Messrs. Boardman and Sons, tendered the part of the rate before application was made for the summons, but refused to pay the balance as being the amount which they alleged represented the part of the rate applicable to non-provided or sectarian schools; that the overseers had at a meeting resolved not to accept part payment of the rates when such part payment was offered or tendered subject to deduction of the part deemed to be in respect of non-provided or sectarian schools; that this resolution was communicated to Mr. John Boardman, but he nevertheless tendered the portion of the rate and claimed to deduct the balance as being in respect of the education rate, but the tender was declined; that on the hearing of the summons before the magistrate Mr. John Boardman on behalf of his firm again tendered the same amount, but the assistant overseer again declined to accept the amount tendered and requested the magistrate to issue a distress warrant for the whole rate, but the magistrate declined to issue a distress warrant for the whole rate, and issued a distress warrant for the balance only; that the overseers were advised that the magistrate had no power to compel the overseers under the circumstances to accept payment of part of the rate from Messrs. Boardman and Sons or to refuse to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate, and they accordingly applied for the above rule for a mandamus.

In an affidavit by Mr. John Boardman as representing his firm he stated that he had a conscientious objection to voluntarily pay that part of the poor rate which was applicable to non-provided or sectarian schools in the parish, and that on that ground his firm had refused to pay the 25*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, the part of the rate which was so applicable; that he had tendered both before the summons and in court the 41*l.*, and that his firm were ready and willing to give all facilities to the overseers and their bailiffs in connection with the execution of the distress warrant ordered to be issued by the magistrate.

Robson, K.C. (Macmorran, K.C. and Artemus Jones with him) showed cause.—No order in the nature of a mandamus ought to go in this case. The magistrate offered to issue a distress warrant for the balance of 25*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, but he refused to issue the distress warrant for the whole amount. The question now is whether the magistrate had a discretion to offer to issue a distress warrant for the balance only, or whether he was bound to issue the warrant for the whole amount. It is submitted that he had a discretion to issue the distress warrant for the balance only—that is, for the amount over and above the sum tendered in court. By the Poor Relief Act 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2) the refusal to pay the poor rate was a criminal offence, and the justices had power to commit to prison—in default of distress for the poor rate—the party against whom the distress warrant should have been issued. Then by the Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14), s. 2, this imprisonment was limited to three months, so that this is a case falling within the criminal law, with the liability to imprisonment over and above the civil liability to pay the debt. Therefore if the magistrate is bound in such a case to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount, notwithstanding that the greater part of that amount has been tendered in court, it would impose upon a ratepayer a much greater punishment than that contemplated by the law. The contention on the part of the overseers is that they are entitled to have the whole rate, and, if they do not get the whole they are entitled to refuse the part tendered. The Act itself and the forms in the schedule show that that is not so, and that the magistrate has a discretion in the matter. The forms of complaint and warrant of distress given in the schedule to the Act—namely, A (1), A (2), B, C (1), and C (2)—all contain the words “hath not paid the same or ‘any part thereof,’ but hath refused to do so,” showing that the Act contemplated that there might be a payment of part of the rate, and a distress warrant for the balance unpaid. The duty of the overseer is to demand the whole rate, but, if he cannot get the whole rate, then he ought to demand a part of it, as he has to inform the magistrate in the complaint (form A 1) that the ratepayer has not paid any part of the rate. The question whether the act of the magistrate in issuing a distress warrant is judicial or ministerial is considered in Archbold's Poor Law, 15th edit., p. 1056, and, although justices may be bound to issue a distress warrant in certain cases, they are not bound to issue the warrant for the whole rate when part has been tendered in court. If the distress warrant is issued for the whole amount when part has been tendered, the ratepayer suffers in two ways—first in being liable to larger costs, and, secondly, by having a larger quantity of goods sold by a forced sale than is necessary.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Edward Morten and Sturges with him) for the overseers in support of the rule.—The magistrate's duty was ministerial only, and he was bound to issue the distress warrant for the whole rate. Sect. 4 of 43 Eliz. c. 2 (the Poor Relief Act 1601) gives the overseers power, by warrant from two justices of the peace, to levy the sums and all arrearages of every one that shall refuse to contribute “according as they shall be assessed” by distress and sale of the offender's goods. Therefore the persons against whom the distress is to go are the persons who refuse to contribute “according as they shall be assessed.” There are a series of cases as to what the jurisdiction of justices is in such cases. The proposition of law to be deduced from the cases is that the justices, when they are called on to act in granting a distress warrant for rates, are entitled to say, “You must show us a legal rate”; but once the rate is legal on the face of it and is in other respects legal, then the duty of the justices is merely ministerial, the reason being that a distress warrant is a process of execution. It is for the overseers to determine whether they will accept part payment of the rate; the discretion to accept part payment rests with them and not with the justices. A question arose as to whether the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 applied to proceedings for the recovery of rates, and the case of Reg. v. Price (42 L. T. Rep. 439; 5 Q. B. Div. 300), which came after the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, decided that that Act did not affect proceedings for the recovery of poor rates, and that a distress warrant for such rates might be issued as before the Act. The reason why the justices were bound to see that the rate was legal on the face of it was for their own protection, as otherwise they might be subject to an action for trespass. That is very clearly put by Parke, B. in Newbould v. Colman (16 L. T. Rep. O. S. 488; 6 Ex. 189), a judgment which shows that the justices act ministerially. So, in Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Hampton Urban Council (79 L. T. Rep. 512, at p. 514; (1899) 1 Q. B. 273, at p. 277), Smith, L.J. says: “The magistrates in granting the warrant of distress act ministerially, the rate itself being the order.” In Reg. v. Handsley (7 Q. B. Div. 398) Field, J. says: “The justices upon due application for a distress warrant are bound to grant it. . . . They themselves have nothing to do but to act ministerially. . . . I think they had no jurisdiction to impose any delay in the execution of the warrant”; and Huddleston, B. says: “There can be no doubt that the justices act ministerially, and not judicially.” The Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14 was careful not to change the Act of Elizabeth, except in the case of imprisonment. In sects. 1 and 2 there are provisions as to costs and as to the issuing a warrant of commitment.

K.B. Div.] REX v. GILLESPIE & OTHERS; Ex parte OVERSEERS OF WEST HAM. [K.B. Div.]

These are in the discretion of the justices, and and as to these they act judicially. In sect. 2 there are really two discretions, whether the person is to go to prison, and, if so, for what time; and a commitment under this section is a punitive order, and not merely a legal process to enforce payment :

Re Edgcote, 87 L. T. Rep. 108 ; (1902) 2 K. B. 403.

Contrasting the language of this statute with the statute of Elizabeth, it is clear that in granting the distress warrant the justices have no discretion. Where the Act intended to give a discretion it says so, as in sect. 1—"if in their discretion they shall so think fit" to make an order as to costs. By sect. 5 the summons "may" be in the form in the schedule, and therefore the forms are permissive, and the forms say "or" any part thereof, not "nor" any part thereof, so that the argument based on the words "or any part thereof" ought not to prevail. The liability to pay the rate is not a mere private debt, but is a public obligation : (per Mathew, J. in Reg. v. Blenkinsop, 66 L. T. Rep., at p. 188 ; (1892) 1 Q. B., at p. 46). In Seaman v. Burley (75 L. T. Rep. 91 ; (1896) 2 Q. B. 344) it was held that an application to enforce payment of a poor rate by distress warrant was a criminal cause for the purpose of an appeal to the Court of Appeal; but so long ago as Reg. v. Governor of Whitecross-street Prison (12 L. T. Rep., at p. 546 ; 6 B. & S., at p. 395) the commitment was considered to be under civil process. Then as to the question of tender, the rate was one entire sum, and the tender to be good must be the tender of the whole sum ; a tender of part of an entire demand is bad as a tender :

Dixon v. Clark, 5 C. B. 365.

It rests entirely with the overseers in the interests of the ratepayers to say whether they will require the whole rate or be satisfied with a part ; but it is not for the magistrate on an application for a distress warrant to say that. The Act compels the ratepayer to pay the whole, and it is entirely in the discretion of the overseers whether they will require the whole to be paid ; but as to that the magistrate's duty is wholly ministerial :

Reg. v. Boteler, 4 B. & S. 959 ;

Ex parte Bridgend Guardians, 9 L. T. Rep. 720.

The utmost to be recovered for costs is entirely independent of the amount of the rate.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I wish it to be distinctly understood that nothing I say in this case must be supposed to give any countenance to the refusal of persons (I am speaking, of course, in a court of law) to pay rates that are justly due, and I desire to make that distinctly plain. I am dealing with this case as though it had arisen in any other ordinary case, and as though I had not known the motive which was set up as an excuse for not paying the whole of the rates. I am anxious to say that because it sometimes has been supposed that a judgment given in a case of this kind has countenanced or given support to matters with which it has nothing to do. As I pointed out, the question in this case which we have to decide is whether, when an application is made to a magistrate under the Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14) and the person against whom the application is made, who must be summoned and who must be there, says, "Here is a part of the money; you can take it to-day," the magistrate is bound to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount. With the greater part, I think I may say with all but one point, of Mr. Danckwerts' able argument I entirely agree. I entirely agree with all the subordinate and minor preliminary propositions that he laid down. I agree with him to this extent that the overseer is entitled to say, "I will not take less than the 441l." It seems to me, having got thus far, that we have only to consider what are the rights and duties of a magistrate asked to issue a distress warrant under the statute. I think it is quite right to say, broadly speaking, that the duty of the magistrate is ministerial, but that does not decide the question, because we have then really got to explain what we mean by the word "ministerial." I have no doubt, and not only have I no doubt, but I have decided in two or three cases in the last two years, that where there is a good rate, and where the magistrate is satisfied that the person is the proper person and has not paid, the grounds which he can consider as a reason for not issuing a distress warrant are very limited. It is not necessary to go through them again. I have never pretended, nor do I now pretend, to give a complete catalogue of them, as some new case may arise, but I am not aware of anything which has ever justified the view that a magistrate must issue a distress warrant if the person is prepared to pay there and then the whole amount. Nor do I know of any authority which suggests that he must issue the distress warrant for the whole if there and then the overseer can receive or has received a part of the money which was due to him. It seems to me that all these questions are really beside the question we have to consider. Nobody, I think, can read the Act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14 without being satisfied that the Legislature contemplated process for part of the rate and payment of part of the rate as well as process for and payment of the whole rate. I am not saying they did not contemplate that under many circumstances a distress warrant would ordinarily go for the whole amount. By sect. 5 the overseers are directed to summon the party before the justices. Therefore the party is to be there, and, although it is quite true that the section itself relates specially to cases where proceedings have been taken to compel payment with a view to a person being lodged in prison, sect. 6 says: "If at any time before such person shall be committed to and lodged in prison for nonpayment thereof, or for or by reason of its being returned to such warrant of distress aforesaid that there are no goods or chattels or no sufficient goods or chattels . . . such person shall pay or tender to the churchwardens or overseers of the poor or any of them, or to the surveyor of highways . . . the sum so sought to be recovered together with the amount of all costs and expenses up to that time incurred. . . ." Therefore it seems to me that the actual words of the statute clearly contemplate that there may be an application made for less than the full amount. I also wish to point out that the statute also contemplates an application being made for more than the amount of a particular rate, because it orders the justices in some cases to issue a distress warrant for the rate and all the arrears that there are, which would of necessity involve some inquiry as to what the real arrears were. When we come to look at the section, it is perfectly true that the forms as forms are only optional. It is perfectly true that the forms need not be exactly followed, because the words are "or forms to the same or the like effect," but still the forms indicate that the Legislature contemplated the Act being used where a part of the rate could not be recovered. Under these circumstances I must say, treating this as an ordinary case and nothing else, I am very much impressed with that which the magistrate has stated to be the practice which has existed now for over fourteen years. He says that he has heard many thousands of poor rate summonses, and it is a very frequent occurrence that the assistant overseer has asked him to order a distress warrant for less amounts than those for which the summonses were issued, payment on account having been accepted by the overseers. The point Mr. Danckwerts takes that impresses me, and the one point that has given me difficulty in this case, is that he says that the overseers need not accept less than the full amount, and the cases in which distress warrants have been issued have been at the request of the overseers. I think that is probably true, and to a very large extent true in those cases, but I think according to the principles of justice, when the statute contemplates process going for a part which is refused to be paid, there being a question of previous tender—I agree that no question of previous tender ought to be gone into, because that might necessitate a trial of what was a tender—and where in court the magistrate is satisfied that the money is to be had for the lifting or for the asking, and the process of the court is only required to enforce payment of the balance, then the magistrate has a right to issue a distress warrant for the balance. I pointed out when this rule was moved that it seemed to me extremely doubtful whether or not a mandamus ought to go, because on that day when the magistrate so acted the overseer could have had the 416*l.* in cash, and a distress warrant for the balance as on that day. I have listened with the greatest attention to the argument in support of this rule, and I am unable to see anything which prevents us from taking what seems to me to be the reasonable and proper course, that where a process is to be issued, it ought to be issued only for that which is really required to be recovered. I must point out that any other judgment would throw upon the recalcitrant debtor, who either was not able to pay or was not willing to pay, larger costs as between himself and the overseer, because the overseer or the other persons who levied would be entitled to recover larger fees in respect of levying a larger amount. I am therefore of opinion that the rule must be discharged. I understand that the respondents' undertaking to pay the amount tendered remains, and that, notwithstanding all that has been said, the respondents undertake to pay the 416*l.* so tendered.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I also agree. I wish to associate myself in my judgment entirely with what my Lord has said with regard to dealing with this case simply on general grounds. I can put my reasons very shortly, and I think, considering the importance of this case, I ought to do so. The question is whether we are by this procedure of mandamus to compel a magistrate to issue a distress warrant in respect of the whole of a rate when on the hearing of the summons an actual tender of a large portion of the rate is made then and there in court before him. Prima facie that would seem to be an unlikely course for the law to be compelled to sanction. It does involve, though without any gain to the overseers, greater cost to the ratepayers. But when we look at the question from the view which Mr. Danckwerts invited us to take, the view of authority, I see nothing in the authorities which compels this court, in obedience to the authority of previous decisions, to take the view that the magistrate ought in this case to be compelled by mandamus to issue the distress warrant for the whole amount. Persons, of course, must pay the rate as ordered by law, and must recognise that which this court has more than once laid down—namely, that a magistrate before whom the person, who ought to pay a rate, is brought for the nonpayment of that rate is acting ministerially and not judicially, in this sense, that if it is a valid rate, if, as, for example, in the case of Reg. v. Bradshaw (2 E. & E. 836; s.c. Reg. v. Warwickshire Justices (2 L. T. Rep. 233), the person summoned is in visible occupation of the property rated, the magistrate cannot go into any other question besides this: "Is there due and unpaid the rate which has been made according to law?" In that sense his duty is ministerial. But then the question arises, Is the magistrate—while accepting and being bound by the rate as being the basis of the amount for which he must put in force the powers intrusted to him by giving a distress warrant and being bound as regards the liability of the person sought to to be charged with the amount which he is to insert in the distress warrant—in issuing the distress warrant bound to overlook the fact that there is an amount as to which the ratepayer then and there in court says, "Here is the amount in part payment." I know of no authority obliging us to come to such a conclusion, and it would seem to me to be most unreasonable if it were so. A good deal of the argument of counsel in support of the rule seemed to me to be outside the real question for consideration, because nobody has suggested that the magistrate, when the person is brought before him by the overseers on a summons for non-payment of a rate, should go into the disputed question as to whether at any time the person who ought to pay the rate has tendered either the whole amount of the rate or any part of it. The magistrate is not there to try the question as to whether there has been a valid tender or not of the whole or of part of the rate. I quite agree that the duty of the magistrate in issuing the distress warrant is ministerial and not judicial. There is the rate and the ratepayer has to pay it, and the magistrate has to see at that moment what is the amount actually unpaid. But directly he does that, he must see that the money is, as in this case, actually produced, and that the ratepayer says that he is willing to pay it. Could it be argued that, supposing a ratepayer came to the court with the whole amount, never having paid up to that moment, the overseer could say, "I will not take the amount even now; I want a distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate." Surely that cannot be right. It would be issuing a distress warrant with all its circumstances of cost and of annoyance against a person who up to that time, no doubt, had not paid, but who then and there actually offers the money before the magistrate, and against whom I presume the magistrate's duty would be to order him to pay the cost so far incurred by the steps which had alone produced the money. It seems to me that while it is not in the least within the function of a magistrate to consider previous tenders, if the money is then and there offered in payment of the whole or any part of the rate, and while he looks at the amount of the rate as prima facie the amount absolutely due, which he must consider to be due as the legal rate, and while he cannot go into the question of the liability of the person who is visibly in occupation of the property rated—then it is not contested his duty is to say that, in using the machinery to get this rate, he must look at, and properly look at, the sum which is there in court, and which leaves him free to put in force that machinery only for the balance remaining unpaid. Therefore on these grounds it seems to me that it would not be right to compel the magistrate to issue a distress warrant for a rate when either the whole or a part of it is actually offered in court before him, and that the overseer as an official can only properly recover the balance, being already, without having recourse to any machinery of distress warrants, enabled there and then to receive that which is either the whole or a substantial part of that which he is entitled to claim.

[K.B. Div.]

Rule discharged.

DAWSON v. GREAT NORTHERN AND CITY RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Compensation—Leasehold—Subsequent acquisition of freehold—Assignment of claim for damage—No notice to treat—Assignment of tort.

A freeholder and leaseholder had notices to treat served upon them by a railway company in respect of their interests. The freeholder then agreed to give the leaseholder a new lease, and subsequently received compensation from the railway company in settlement of all claims under the notice to treat, except claims for damage by subsidence.

The freeholder then sold the freehold to the leaseholder.

During the new lease and after the acquisition of the freehold, structural damage was caused to the premises and to the stock and the trade.

Held, that the original leaseholder was only entitled to compensation in respect of such damage, if any, as occurred under the original lease in respect of which the notice to treat was served.

The acceptance by the sub-lessee of a new sub-lease and the implied surrender of the original one after the notice to treat has been served in respect of the interest in the original sub-lease, the damage having been done during the continuance of the original sub-lease, does not preclude the sub-lessee from recovering compensation.

A claim for compensation under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act 1845 is in the nature of a claim for damages for a wrong, and as such is not a legal chose in action within sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1875 so that the assignee can sue in her own name.

ACTION brought to recover the amount of a verdict and judgment recovered by the plaintiff in an inquiry held before a judge and special jury under the Lands Clauses Act 1845 and the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, s. 41, for the purpose of assessing the compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff for damage caused to her premises and stock and trade as a result of subsidence, consequent on the construction by the defendants of tunnels for an underground railway.

The plaintiff's premises comprised certain freehold houses also some leasehold houses called the Hewitt and Berry and Vickery leaseholds respectively.

*The defendants' works were executed between April and Oct. 1901, causing damage which was assessed by the jury at 2100*l.* in respect of structural damage and 2000*l.* in respect of damage to stock and trade. All the structural damage occurred before Dec. 1901, and the other damage during 1902 while the repairs were executed.*

The plaintiff or her predecessor had been tenant of the freeholds till the end of 1899 under one Blake.

In March 1899 the defendants served on Blake the usual notice to treat in respect of his freehold interest, also a notice on the plaintiff in respect of her then interest.

*Blake agreed to settle his claim against the defendants for 850*l.

In Oct. 1899 Blake agreed to give the plaintiff a fresh lease for twenty-one years, and in March 1901 he sold the freeholds to her, deducting a portion of the money paid by the defendants from the price.

The plaintiff from 1892 to Dec. 1901 was a sub-lessee of the Hewitt leaseholds for a term to end in 1913.

On the 31st Dec. 1901 the plaintiff accepted new sub-leases for an extended term.

In June or July 1899 notices to treat were served on the freeholder, on Hewitt, and on the plaintiff in regard to their respective interests.

The plaintiff acquired the Berry and Vickery leaseholds in March and May 1902 by assignments for long terms after the structural damage had been done.

Berry and Vickery assigned to the plaintiff their rights to compensation for the damage done to their interests, notice of which assignment was given to the defendants.

No notice to treat in respect of the Berry and Vickery leaseholds had been given to anyone.

WRIGHT, J.—This action is brought upon a verdict and judgment obtained by the plaintiff at an inquiry held before a judge and jury in lieu of a sheriff and jury under the provisions of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, s. 41, for the purpose of assessing the compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff for damage caused to her premises, stock, and trade as a result of subsidence consequent on the construction by the defendants of tunnels for an underground railway. The plaintiff's premises comprised, firstly, certain freehold houses, Nos. 119 to 125, odd numbers, in the City-road, and Nos. 1 to 5, odd numbers, in East-road; secondly, certain leasehold houses, Nos. 127 to 133, odd numbers, in the City-road, and Nos. 7 to 13, odd numbers, in East-road, which I will call the Hewitt leaseholds; and, thirdly, certain other leasehold houses, Nos. 135 to 139, odd numbers, in the City-road, and Nos. 15 to 19, odd numbers, in East-road, which I will call the Berry and Vickery leaseholds. The defendants' works were executed between the beginning of April 1901 and the end of Oct. 1901. The structural damage which is now admitted to have been the result of those works occurred between the beginning of April 1901 and the 31st Dec. 1901. In addition to the cost of making good this structural damage, the plaintiff's stocks were damaged and her trade injuriously affected during repairs which were executed during 1902. The plaintiff's claim, dated the 25th June 1902, appears to be framed upon sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. The jury found their verdict for 2100*l.* for structural damage and 2000*l.* for damage to stock and trade, and by agreement of the parties these sums are to be treated as respectively attributable as to one-third, or 700*l.* and 666*l.*, to the freeholds, one-third to the Hewitt leaseholds, and one-third to the Berry and Vickery leaseholds. The question in this action is whether the plaintiff can show title to the compensation the amounts of which have been so ascertained. I will consider first the freeholds. The plaintiff or her predecessor in title has been tenant of them from Blake under a lease which expired at the end of 1899. During the currency of that the defendants served on Blake in March 1899 the usual notice to treat in respect of his freehold interest, and on the plaintiff in July 1899 in respect of her then interest. Afterwards, in October of the same year, Blake agreed to give the plaintiff a fresh lease for twenty-one years. In Feb. 1900 the defendants and Blake agreed for the payment to him of 850*l.* in settlement of all his claims under their notice to treat, except claims for damage by subsidence. In March 1901 Blake sold the freeholds to the plaintiff, subject to the easements acquired by the defendants, deducting from the price payable to him by the plaintiff a portion of the 850*l.* Under these circumstances it seems to me to follow from the doctrine established in the decisions collected in Mercer v. Liverpool, St. Helens, and South Lancashire Railway Company (88 L. T. Rep. 374; (1903) 1 K. B. 652) that, whether the plaintiff's case depends on the notice to treat which was served upon her in July 1899 or on her notice of claim under sect. 68, she is not entitled to compensation for damage except in respect of her interest in the residue of the old lease which still subsisted at the date of the notice to treat, and in respect of that interest she suffered no damage or disturbance. Before Blake agreed to give her a new lease or to sell to her the freehold, he had become bound, under the notice to treat which had been served upon him, to allow the defendants to execute their works and cause necessary damage in the execution of them on the terms of the defendants paying to him such compensation as the damage might require, and he could not, as against the defendants, create any new interest in the plaintiff which would subject the defendants to any new burden in her favour in respect of their works. The jury, therefore, in giving to the plaintiff 700*l.* for structural damage to the freeholds have given to her what the defendants were, by their notice to treat, bound to pay Blake, and the defendants cannot be under an obligation to pay her also for the same damage. This would be still more clear as regards any portion of the 700*l.* which the jury may have given for structural damage caused before the sale of freeholds by Blake in 1901. To compensation for such damage the plaintiff could not have any claim unless by virtue of some assignment of Blake's right, and no such assignment was made by him. A similar conclusion seems to me to be necessary in the case of the 666*l.*—that is, the one-third of 2000*l.* which the jury are to be taken to have given for damage to trade and stock in respect of the freeholds. Nothing was done during the old lease to cause any such damage, and the new lease must be regarded as a lease taken of premises which the defendants had acquired the right to damage upon the terms of compensating Blake. The subsidence being rightfully caused by the defendants, the plaintiff cannot charge them with the inconveniences of repair. As regards the Hewitt leaseholds, Hewitt was lessee of them for a long term from Blake, and the plaintiff was from 1892 until the 31st Dec. 1901 sub-lessee of them for Hewitt for a term to end in 1913. Notices to treat were served by the defendants in June or July 1899 on Blake and Hewitt and the plaintiff in regard to their respective interests. On the 31st Dec. 1901 (that is, after the damage had been done, the plaintiff accepted from Hewitt new sub-leases for an extended term. I think that she was entitled to recover compensation under this head, either under the notice to treat or under sect. 68. At the time of the notice her old sub-leases had still about thirteen years to run, and it is agreed that the whole of the structural damage is to be taken to have occurred before the old sub-lease was determined on the 31st Dec. 1901. At the time when she accepted the new sub-lease a right to compensation for the damage to her interest in the old sub-lease was vested in her, and that right would not, as I apprehend, be destroyed by her acceptance of a new sub-lease or the implied surrender of the old one. She is therefore entitled to maintain this action for the agreed proportions—namely, 700*l.* and 666*l.*—in respect of those Hewitt leaseholds. Lastly, the Berry and Vickery leaseholds were acquired by the plaintiff by assignments for long terms from Berry and Vickery in March and May 1902 after the structural damage had occurred,

K.B. Div.] NOKES & ANOTHER (apps.) v. ISLINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL (resps.). [K.B. Div.]

the assignments of the lease being accompanied by assignments from Berry and Vickery of their respective rights to compensation. Notices of the last-mentioned assignments were given to the defendants in supposed accordance with sect. 25 of the Judicature Act. No notice to treat has ever been given by the defendants to anyone in relation to the premises comprised in their leases, and the plaintiff's claim was founded on the assignment to the plaintiff by Berry and Vickery of their rights to compensation. The assignment by Berry recites that the premises have before the date thereof become damaged, and the assignment by Vickery is expressly limited to things done or omitted before its date. The question which arises upon the assignments is not whether the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of them, nor whether she might not have proceeded in the names of the assignors to obtain an assessment of the compensation to which they were entitled, and which she might have claimed from them after assessment. The question is whether she could in her own name enforce payment of it as against these defendants. In considering this question, it is important to observe that the claims which Berry and Vickery purported to assign were founded on sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, and not on any notice to treat. If the assigned claims had been claims arising upon a notice to treat, they might have been regarded as claims arising upon a contract, or as claims to something which might be considered as the price payable by the defendants for the right to exercise their powers in the assignor's lands, and therefore as property, and in either view as legal choses in action. But, in the absence of any notice to treat the element of contract or quasi contract or of proprietary right seems to be wanting, and the claim seems to be in the nature of a claim for damages for a wrong—a wrong, indeed, which cannot be stopped by injunction or otherwise remedied in an action, but which gives rise to a right to assessment of damages; and, in the apparent absence of authority, I think that such a claim is not a legal chose in action within the meaning of the Judicature Act 1875, s. 25: (see May v. Lane, 71 L. T. Rep. 869). There are, no doubt, some expressions in the judgments of the Lords Justices in the case of Colonial Bank v. Whinney (53 L. T. Rep. 272; 30 Ch. Div. 261) which seem to approve a statement in Williams on Personal Property, to the effect that a right to damages for a tort may be a legal chose in action; but the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case was reversed in the House of Lords, and it is difficult to suppose that it was intended by sect. 25 of the Judicature Act to make all rights to damages (for example, for libel or assault) assignable under that section. But, however this may be, there are other difficulties in the plaintiff's way. The assignments by Berry and Vickery of their claims could of course operate only as assignments of what they were entitled to. But the jury seem to have given compensation, not for the damages sustained by Berry and Vickery, but for the damage sustained by the plaintiff. This is clearly so as to the damage to trade and stock. The learned judge at the hearing directed the minds of the jury to nothing but the injury to the plaintiff's own trade and stock. Berry and Vickery were not shown to have suffered any damage to their trade or to their stock, and, as regards the structural damage also, the jury seem to have been allowed to assess the compensation on the footing of what the damage was to the plaintiff, and the measure of that is not necessarily the same as the measure of what the damages would have been to premises as used for different trades and purposes which might require different degrees of repair. Without the aid of the Judicature Act it seems to me clear that the plaintiff could not take proceedings in her own name. All the damage was done before the assignments of the leases, and was damage done, not to her interest, but to the interests of Berry and Vickery, and could not be claimed by her in her own name. So far as I know, there is no principle of law which enables a purchaser of an estate or interest in land to maintain an action for a wrong done in relation to the land during the time when it belonged to his vendor, except where the wrong is a continuing one, as in the case of a permanent nuisance (see Penruddock's case, 5 Co. Rep. 100b; and per Parke, B. in Thompson v. Gibbons, 56 R. R. 762; 7 M. & W. 456), and I think that the law must be in the same relation to claims under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. The result of that, so far as I am concerned, is that the plaintiff gets judgment for the 700l. and the 666l. in respect of the Hewitt leases.

Judgment accordingly.

NOKES AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. ISLINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL (resps.). (a)

Metropolis—By-law—Reasonableness—No provision as to notice—Insufficient water-closet accommodation—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 39 (1).

By by-law 26 made by the London County Council pursuant to sect. 39 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 it was provided that: "The landlord or owner of any lodging-house shall provide and maintain in connection with such house water-closet, earth-closet, or privy accommodation in the proportion of not less than one water-closet, earth-closet, or privy for every twelve persons."

The by-laws further provided a penalty upon any breach thereof.

There was no provision as to notice to the landlord or owner.

Held, that the by-law was bad on the ground that it was not reasonable.

CASE stated on a complaint preferred by a sanitary inspector on behalf of the respondents against the appellants for that they, being the owners, as defined by the by-laws of the London County Council made under sect. 39 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, of a certain lodging-house, did not from the 3rd March to the 20th April 1903 provide and maintain sufficient water-closet accommodation, contrary to the provisions of the by-laws and the Act.

At the hearing of the complaint it was proved that the appellants were agents for letting and collecting and in fact collected the rent of the premises in question during the period mentioned in the complaint, and during such period the house contained nine rooms and one water-closet only and no earth-closet or privy.

In July 1902 the house was let out in tenements to members of more than one family, and the appellants collected the rents of the several tenements from the tenants thereof.

In Sept. 1902 the whole of the tenants of the house were ejected by the appellants. From Sept. 1902 to Jan. 1903 the house was unoccupied.

In Jan. 1903 the whole of the house was let to one tenant, C. Gates, at the rent (which was a rack rent) of 36l. per annum, payable 3l. per month in advance.

On the 5th Jan. 1903 three rooms only in the house were occupied by six people.

On the 3rd March 1903 the whole of the rooms in the house were occupied, and continued to be occupied till the 20th April 1903, by sixteen people, who constituted four separate families.

The rooms in the house not required by C. Gates for his own occupation were let by him to lodgers, from whom he received rent on his own account.

On the 11th March 1903 an intimation that the closet accommodation was insufficient was left on the premises and also at the appellants' office.

On the 25th March 1903 a letter was sent to the appellants calling attention to the matter, to which the appellants replied, saying that they were not the "landlords."

The appellants on the 26th March 1903 sent to the tenant of the house a letter advising him to reduce the number of tenants to avoid being summoned for not having sufficient closet accommodation.

It was objected on the part of the appellants (a) that the by-law No. 26 of the London County Council made under sect. 39 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, so far as it required the landlord or owner of any lodging-house to provide and maintain in connection with such house water-closet accommodation in the proportion of one water-closet for every twelve persons, was ultra vires and illegal, and that the magistrate had therefore no jurisdiction to deal with the complaint; and, further, (b) that, before any offence could be committed against the by-laws if valid, a notice from the sanitary authority was necessary; and also (c) that the by-law, if valid, did not apply to the appellants, as they were not the owners of the premises within the meaning of the by-laws.

The magistrate overruled the objection and convicted the appellants.

In the by-laws in question it was provided by No. 26:

The occupier of any premises shall cause every water-closet to such premises to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as often as may be necessary for the purpose of keeping such water-closet in cleanly condition. The occupier of any premises shall once at least in every week cause every earth-closet, privy, and receptacle for dung belonging to such premises to be emptied and thoroughly cleansed. The occupier of any premises shall at least once in every three months cause every cesspool belonging to such premises to be emptied and thoroughly cleansed. Provided that where two or more lodgers in a lodging-house are entitled to the use in common of any water-closet, earth-closet, privy, cesspool, or receptacle for dung the landlord shall cause such water-closet, earth-closet, privy, cesspool, or receptacle for dung to be cleansed and emptied as aforesaid. The landlord or owner of any lodging-house shall provide and maintain in connection with such house water-closet, earth-closet, or privy accommodation in the proportion of not less than one water-closet, earth-closet, or privy for every twelve persons. For the purposes of this by-law "a lodging-house" means a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family. "Landlord," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest) by whom or on whose behalf such house or part of a house is let in lodgings or for occupation by members of more than one family, or who for the time being receives or is entitled to receive the profits arising from such letting. "Lodger," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means a person to whom any room or rooms in such house or part of a house may be let as a lodging or for his use or occupation. Nothing in this by-law shall extend to any common lodging-house.

Under these by-laws a penalty was provided upon breach, but they contained no provision as to notice to the landlord or owner.

Woodfin (Knight with him) for the appellants.—This by-law purports to be made under sect. 39 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, but it is not one relating to water-closets, &c., as mentioned in the section, but with regard to lodging-houses. The present by-law is unreasonable and repugnant to the statute, for it does not require notice to be given, and sect. 37 of the Act of 1891 requires a notice. It is therefore ultra vires and void. It is also repugnant to the common law, because by its provisions the sanitary authority has power to compel a person who has no power to act to commit a tort.

Courthope-Munroe for the respondents.—The by-law is valid and reasonable even although notice is not required. Notice is only required to be given under sect. 37 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. He referred to Salt v. Scott Hall, 86 L. T. Rep. 868; (1903) 2 K. B. 245.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think the objection taken to this by-law by Mr. Woodfin in the way he has stated it is a good objection. In reply he summarised his argument very concisely and neatly by stating that it was objected before the magistrate that the by-law was unreasonable because in the analogous circumstances under sect. 37 it is contemplated that the sanitary authority shall give a specific notice; that this by-law contemplates none; and therefore the by-law is unreasonable. I think in substance that is a good objection. I have no doubt whatever as to the power of the county council to make these by-laws. I think the point taken by Mr. Woodfin originally—that this must be regarded as a lodging-house notice, and that, inasmuch as lodging-house water-closet accommodation is not governed by sect. 94, this lodging-house by-law for providing water-closets is bad—is not a good point. I agree with Mr. Courthope-Munroe's argument that sect. 39 is a re-enactment with some amendment of the old provision which now puts upon the county council the duty which was previously put upon certain other local authorities. I think, therefore, that under sect. 39 this is quite within that section. That these sanitary powers ought to be construed liberally, we have often pointed out. It is competent to the county council to make an order in connection with the water-closet by-laws that there shall be what they think at any rate a right and proper minimum of water-closet accommodation in respect of any tenement or any class of tenement, but that does not decide the question for reasons which I think will appear to be obvious. Sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 imposes the duty upon the sanitary authority of observing and enforcing the by-laws under this section. The by-laws themselves contemplate that any person who offends against one of the by-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of 5*l*. This case illustrates the importance of there being some notice given to the person complained of. Nokes and Nokes collected the rent which Gates paid, and I agree with the argument of Mr. Courthope-Munroe that, having regard to sect. 141, they ought to be treated as standing in the position of their clients. There is no doubt about that. On the other hand, Gates is the responsible person for allowing more than the twelve persons to be in the house with one water-closet. Therefore it is a case in which injustice may be done if proceedings are taken against people who may have partly parted or wholly parted with the control of their premises, unless some notice is given to them before proceedings are taken, because they may attempt to put pressure on their tenants to reduce the number of such tenants, as was done here. But why I think the by-law, which does not contemplate any notice being given to the landlord or owner before he is proceeded against for a penalty, is bad is because I find—the sanitary authority being the persons who are to say what is the minimum number of water-closets which according to the circumstances are to be required, and the sanitary authority being the persons who have power with regard to any house, whether built before or after the commencement of the Act, to say what is a sufficient water-closet accommodation for a given number of people, and who have to give a statutory notice calling upon the landlord or owner to provide that the terms of sect. 37 shall be carried out, and that if not he shall be liable to a penalty of 5*l*.—sect. 37 contemplates that the authority shall give notice to the landlord or owner before proceedings are taken. I think, therefore, this objection to a by-law which imposes a penalty for the breach of it, especially when you remember it is intended to be put in force against people who are not in fact owners, but are put in the position of owners, is a good one, and that there should be the same kind of notice given to them before proceedings are taken as is contemplated by sect. 37. I think, therefore, this by-law, which provides that proceedings may be taken and that the landlord shall provide closet accommodation, and does not make provision for a notice to be given before proceedings are taken, is not a reasonable by-law.

McNAIR (app.) v. BAKER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

McNAIR (app.) v. BAKER (resp.). (a)

Metropolis—Smoke—Chimney of club—Smoke from cooking ranges and heating apparatus—“Private dwelling-house”—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 24 (b).

The chimney of a club of 750 members, such club containing the usual club accommodation, emitting smoke from the cooking ranges and the furnaces of a vertical boiler used for heating the premises, is not the chimney of a “private dwelling-house” within the exception contained in sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

CASE stated on a complaint preferred by the appellant against the respondent for making default in complying with the requisitions of a notice requiring him to abate a nuisance arising from black smoke having been allowed to issue from a furnace chimney, and to prevent a recurrence of the same.

The appellant was a sanitary inspector of the city of Westminster.

The respondent was the secretary of the St. James' Club, situate at No. 106, Piccadilly, within the city of Westminster, and represented the club.

In consequence of information received by the appellant of the issue of black smoke from the premises of the club, the premises were watched by the appellant in October. Quantities of black smoke were in that month, and also in the months of November and December, observed to issue from the premises.

On the 1st Oct. an intimation notice was served by the appellant on the club.

The issue of black smoke did not abate, and on the 31st Oct. a statutory notice was duly served on the club, but the issue of black smoke continued.

The club is managed by a committee, and has occupied the premises for thirty or forty years past. Previously the premises were used as the French Embassy. The club consists of 750 members, and its premises comprise the ordinary accommodation of a West-end club. There are two dining-rooms for the general use of members, and there are also private dining-rooms which may be engaged by members without extra payment for special occasions. There are five bedrooms for the use of members, four of which may be hired by members respectively for a week only at one time, and one of which may at the discretion of the committee be hired by a member for three, six, nine, or twelve months at one time respectively. The use of the bedrooms is in these and other respects subject to the rules of the club and the regulations of the committee thereunder. There are eight other bedrooms for the use of the staff of the club. The club is open during particular hours according to the rules. The food is bought by the committee and sold to members.

In the basement of the premises there are several covered-in cooking ranges, a large roasting-grate, and a vertical boiler with furnace attached. The smoke from these various arrangements discharges into one flue, which is the chimney complained of herein. The principal part of the smoke emitted from the flue, originated in the furnace and boiler. The furnace and boiler were used for the purpose of heating the premises.

On the hearing of the summons it was submitted by the respondent that the chimney was the chimney of a "private dwelling-house" within sect. 24 (b) and was therefore not liable to be dealt with under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

The appellant by his counsel contended that the words "private dwelling-house" meant a family residence or home, and that the use of the premises excluded them from the exemption of the section, and that as the chimney sent forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance it was liable to be dealt with under the Act.

The magistrate found as a fact that the respondent did not abate the nuisance or do what was necessary to prevent the recurrence of the same or otherwise comply with the statutory notice. He further found as a fact that the chimney of the club sent forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance. But he held, on the construction of the section of the Act, that the chimney was the chimney of a private dwelling-house, and that the premises as used by the club were a private dwelling-house within the meaning of the section, and he dismissed the summons.

The question upon which the opinion of the court was desired was whether, upon the facts set out, the chimney was the chimney of a private dwelling-house, and whether the premises of the St. James' Club, as used by the club, were a private dwelling-house within sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

Macmorran, K.C. (J. Hurst with him) for the appellant.—The magistrate was wrong in holding that this chimney was "the chimney of a private dwelling-house," and so was within the exception contained in sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. In German v. Chapman (37 L. T. Rep. 685; 7 Ch. Div. 271) a building for the education and lodging of 100 girls in connection with a charitable institution supported by voluntary contributions was held to be a breach of a covenant to use any house or building erected upon certain land "for a private dwelling-house only," and in Hobson v. Tulloch (78 L. T. Rep. 224; (1898) 1 Ch. 424) using a house as a boarding-house for scholars attending a school in the neighbourhood kept by the owner of the house was held to be a breach of a covenant not to use the house "for any other purpose than a private residence." Again, where a landlord entered into an agreement to let a residential flat to a tenant under conditions and regulations which clearly showed that the building in which the flat was situated was intended to be used for residential flats only, he was restrained in Hudson v. Cripps (73 L. T. Rep. 741; (1896) 1 Ch. 265) from turning a large part of the building into a club. He referred to Queen Anne Residential Mansions and Hotel Company v. Mayor of Westminster, 46 Sol. Jo. 70.

Boydell Houghton for the respondent.—This club was a private dwelling-house within the meaning of the section, and was not used in any sense for the purpose of trade. The cases quoted are quite different from the present one, and, when one looks at sect. 24 (a), the magistrate arrived at a correct finding of fact so far as sect. 24 (b) is concerned.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Mr. Boydell Houghton has argued this case in the only way it could be argued, supporting the view that the magistrate has taken a correct view of the section. The magistrate has not found a finding of fact binding on us, but has held, on the construction of the Act, that the chimney was a chimney of a private dwelling-house. He has found that this building was used for the residence of some 750 members, and that there was cooking going on for them when they came in, and that the warming of the whole club was done by the furnace, and that, in addition to the bedrooms for members which could be let out, there were the bedrooms for the servants. We have got to say whether this is a chimney of a private dwelling-house or not. Quite apart from the authorities, and the authorities Mr. Macmorran has cited are all in favour of his view, to my mind it is quite impossible to come to the conclusion as a matter of law that a chimney such as this is described to be is the chimney of a private dwelling-house. I am not dealing with the original construction of the building, nor how it might be used, but as it is to-day. After enumerating a number of furnaces and fireplaces that come within the Act, the section says, "Any chimney sending forth black smoke in such quantity (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) as to be a nuisance." In my opinion it cannot be contended that, looking at the fair construction of that section, this is the chimney of a private dwelling-house, and I think the magistrate ought to have convicted.

Sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 does not apply to sect. 75 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, incorporated in the Act of 1875 by sect. 160.

Expenses of putting up a hoarding under sect. 75 of the Act of 1847 can be therefore recovered, although three months have not elapsed since the demand.

GARBUTT (app.) v. DURHAM JOINT COMMITTEE (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

CASE stated on a complaint to recover the sum of 1l. 10s. 6d. for expenses incurred upon default of compliance with a notice under sect. 160 of the Public Health Act 1875.

At the hearing of the complaint it was proved on behalf of the appellants that on the 13th Nov. 1902 the surveyor to the appellants reported to them that the roof of a certain house (for which the respondent acted as agent) was in a dangerous state, and that on the 17th Nov. the surveyor, pursuant to sect. 75 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, incorporated by sect. 160 of the Public Health Act 1875, served a notice personally upon the respondent calling upon him within three days to take down or repair the roof, and that in default of his so doing complaint would be made before two justices in accordance with the provisions of the statutes in that case made and provided.

The terms of this notice were not complied with, and the appellants, pursuant to the section, caused a hoarding to be erected in front of the house on the 31st Dec. 1902, and the charges of the person employed to erect such hoarding, amounting to the sum of 1l. 8s., had been paid by the appellants.

A summons had been applied for by the appellants against the respondent, but was not proceeded with as in the meantime the dangerous building had been made safe by the respondent.

On the 13th Feb. 1903 a formal demand for payment of 1l. 8s. and of 2s. 6d., the cost of the summons, was made by the appellants upon the respondent.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that, inasmuch as the three months had not elapsed since the date of the demand upon him, as allowed in cases of apportionment by sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, the complaint laid by the appellants was premature (the date of the complaint being the 6th May 1903), and that the respondent was entitled to go to arbitration as to the amount payable.

The justices upheld this contention and dismissed the complaint.

S. R. C. Bosanquet for the appellants.—In this case the work was done and the expense thereof was payable by the owner by sect. 75 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), which is incorporated by sect. 160 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55). Sect. 257 of the Act of 1875 does not apply to this case at all, and the justices were wrong in holding that it did. He referred to

Mayor of Folkestone v. Brooks, 69 L. T. Rep. 403; (1893) 3 Ch. 22.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think the view of the appellants is right. The Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 provides by sect. 75 that all the expenses of putting up the hoarding or fence shall be paid by the owner. There is no question as to joint owners here, or as to the liability of any other persons to pay. It is said that, because under sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, where expenses have been settled and apportioned by the surveyor of the local authority as payable by the owner, such apportionment is to be binding and conclusive unless within three months he disputes them, the amount here is not payable as it can be disputed, and, as that section applies, the respondent can go to arbitration as to what should be apportioned on him. That is not so. There is no question of apportionment here. All that might arise would be a question of amount.

LAWRANCE and KENNEDY concurred.

Bosanquet asked for the costs although the respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Although it is not the general practice of this court to give costs against a respondent who does not appear on an appeal and who was the defendant in the court below, the view of the court is that our discretion is not fettered by any rule. It is only the practice not to give costs in such cases in the absence of special circumstances. Here the application to the justices was in the nature of a civil proceeding to recover a debt, and, as the respondent saw fit to raise an untenable defence of this kind, I think here we can grant costs against him.

GARBUTT (app.) v. DURHAM JOINT COMMITTEE (resps.). (a)

Police—Pension—Approved service—Continuous service—Break in service—Police Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), s. 1.

The "approved service" referred to in sect. 1 of the Police Act 1890 must be continuous service to entitle a constable to a pension.

CASE stated by quarter sessions on an application made on behalf of the appellant, a retired police constable, by way of appeal against the refusal of the standing joint committee to admit his claim to a pension under the Police Act 1890.

On the hearing of the application the appellant relied upon a certificate of approved service for upwards of twenty-five years which was produced, and which (save for the objection hereinafter mentioned) was admitted to be a certificate duly given under the Act and to refer to the appellant.

The certificate showed service for twenty-five years and ninety-nine days, but also showed two breaks in the service of four and two months respectively, such breaks not being included in the above period.

The respondents tendered evidence to the effect that the service of the appellant during the period had not in fact been diligent and faithful service, and contended that the certificate related to the period of service and was not conclusive evidence, and that the acting chief constable could not certify as to character, which appeared from the police records, and that the joint committee were entitled to exercise their discretion as to granting or withholding a pension on the ground of misconduct.

The appellant contended that it was not open to the respondents to contradict the certificate,

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

GARBUIT (app.) v. DURHAM JOINT COMMITTEE (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

and that such evidence was therefore inadmissible.

On this point the justices agreed with the contention of the appellant, and refused to receive evidence as to the character of the appellant.

The respondents further contended that, upon the true construction of the Act, it was necessary that the whole period of service of twenty-five years should be continuous in order to entitle the appellant to a pension in respect thereof.

The appellant contended that the period need not be continuous, and further contended that even so the certificate of approved service once given precluded the respondents from raising this point.

The Court of Quarter Sessions considered that the Act required that the whole period should be continuous, and, inasmuch as the certificate showed on its face that there had been two breaks in the period of service, they considered that it was open to the respondents to raise this point.

They accordingly dismissed the application.

Pickersgill (Simey with him) for the appellant.—At the end of the certificate showing the service, the chief constable states: "I certify that the term of approved service entered above has been diligent and faithful service within the meaning of sect. 4 of the Police Act 1890." Under that section the certificate by the chief officer of the police force as to the period of a constable's approved service is to be "sufficient evidence" thereof. The respondents therefore cannot go behind this certificate, and so the appellant here, having completed not less than twenty-five years' approved service, is entitled to his pension under sect. 1 of the Police Act 1890. Nowhere does it appear by that statute that this approved service must be continuous. That deduction cannot be drawn merely because in other sections of the Act a constable is allowed to include in the length of time of his service approved service with another police force or service with the army reserve when called out for war or training.

M. Shearman, K.C. (Meynell with him) for the respondents.—It is true that sect. 4 of the Act of 1890 says that the certificate of the chief officer of the police force shall be sufficient evidence, but it does not say that it shall be conclusive evidence. When the certificate is looked at it shows two breaks in the service. When the whole statute is looked at it is clear that approved service must be continuous service to entitle the constable to a pension. He referred to

Walker v. Simpson, 88 L. T. Rep. 306; (1903) A. C. 208.

By sect. 21, the police authorities, if the constable has not been dismissed, have power to return the deductions that have been made if the constable leaves without pension or gratuity. If the contention of the appellant is correct, a constable might get these deductions, rejoin again, and yet in the end get his pension, although he might have resigned and rejoined several times.

Pickersgill in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is not free from difficulty, and I certainly think it very desirable that the matter should be put beyond all question by some amending Act, or by some regulation, if such can be made, which will produce that result. I am, however, of opinion that, upon the construction of the Act, the service referred to must be continuous service. I wish to say in this case, and I will deal with the matter in a moment, that there seem to be peculiar difficulties in the way that do not always arise. There is, as far as I can gather, no certificate of the police authority and there is no order of the police authority under sub-sect. 1 of sect. 4. I do not say that there was none in this case, but all I say is that none has been produced before us. The document that came before us was the certificate signed by the chief officer of the police under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 4, and I have no doubt that that is intended to be sufficient evidence of the period of the constable's approved service in any particular force. But that, of course, does not touch the question that we are dealing with, and whether or not that certificate could be gone behind is another matter which it is not necessary for us to consider. I should have thought that it would require a very strong case to go behind that certificate; but, be that as it may, I only desire to point out that we are not here dealing with the order of the authority, the standing committee of the quarter sessions and the county council, made under sub-sect. 1 of sect. 4. Therefore the case which comes before us is this: There is the certificate under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 4, which shows twenty-five years and ninety-nine days' service made up of three periods, there being a break of four months in 1881 when the constable resigned, he then being a first class constable, and he was afterwards reinstated as a second class constable. Mr. Pickersgill has said that he resigned of his own free will and was not dismissed. I will take it so, but, if that is so, it rather makes clear, what I think is the real construction of this certificate, that he re-engaged himself. Then he was called upon to resign in Feb. 1899, and he was reinstated as a second class constable in April 1899. In other words, there are two breaks, and I think it must be taken that either he was called upon to resign or that he did resign. Therefore what we have to consider is whether "approved service" in this Act means continuous service, or means service that may be made up of certain periods with breaks. I should like to say that it seems to me that the words taken by themselves do not in any way indicate the service might not be made up of several periods. If we take the case of Walker v. Simpson (sup.) to which Mr. Shearman called attention in the Privy Council, where they were dealing with the question of what was service, I can see no difficulty or doubt that under those circumstances, as Lord Macnaghten there pointed out, the service for a certain time may be a service made up of broken periods. But what we have to consider is what was meant in this Act, and, although I do not come to the conclusion without doubt, I think, looking at this Act, there are certain clauses which show that it must have been meant to have been continuous service, or else the clauses are absolutely unnecessary. The first section speaks of a man completing not less than twenty-five years' approved service and completing fifteen years' approved service. That of itself does not, to my mind, decide the case, but it rather points in the direction of the period

GARBUTT (app.) v. DURHAM JOINT COMMITTEE (respe.).

being completed, I think, as a continuous period. But of course that might be very easily rebutted, because the transmission from it is so very small by the subsequent provisions. Therefore we have got to see what light is thrown upon it by the other provisions. Now, the first important provision is under sub-sect. 1 of sect. 4: "The service of a constable for the purposes of this Act shall be subject to such deductions in respect of sickness, misconduct, or neglect of duty as may be made therefrom in pursuance of the regulations of the force to which the constable belongs; and the expression 'approved service' shall for the purposes of this Act mean such service as may after such deductions as aforesaid (if any) be certified under the order of the police authority to have been diligent and faithful service." Again I think, to a certain extent, it rather supports Mr. Shearman's view, because it speaks of deductions in respect of sickness, misconduct, or neglect of duty, which would refer to the period when a man was, so to speak, serving, but it is not conclusive, because it is quite possible to apply those words to the several periods of service and to make a deduction for each period, and then the sum total of the various periods—the deductions having already been made—will come up to the twenty-five years. So that again you have got a section which is not a conclusive one, but which, I think, favours the view of the service being continuous. Sub-sect. 4, about the man shifting from one force to another, which was relied upon by Mr. Shearman, I do not think touches the question at all. That was necessary, because it might be thought that the man's service in one force would not be continuous service in another force, and therefore that was necessary to entitle men to count service in force A as being approved service in force B. But sub-sect. 5 does seem to be quite different. If Mr. Pickersgill's argument is correct, that all periods are to be added, then why should sub-sect. 5 be added, that where the constable with the knowledge of the police authority is called out for training or for permanent services, he shall be entitled after returning to the police force after the end of such training or service to reckon any approved service which he was entitled to reckon at the commencement. Now, if there was ever a case in which such a break as that ought not to make any difference and that therefore the man would be entitled to add together the pieces of service which he had performed, you would think that that would be the case, and yet you see that it has to be provided for by express enactment. Therefore that seems to point in the direction of absence from the force without such leave as not being considered part of the approved service, there being a direction that he shall be entitled to reckon what he was entitled to at the commencement of his absence as approved service in the force. Then, if you come to sect. 5, sub-sect. 5, which is the section which deals with disablement and incapacity during the service, we find a corresponding provision which again is, I think, absolutely unnecessary if Mr. Pickersgill's argument is right—namely, that all these periods may be added together. That says: "Where a constable so serves again, the provisions of this Act as to retirement and pensions, allowances, and gratuities shall apply as if he had not previously retired, save that, except in the case of a pension for non-accidental injuries received in the execution of duty, he shall not reckon as approved service the time which elapsed between his former retirement and the commencement of his service again." That, again, may point to a case in which the break is especially provided for by allowing the provisions to apply as though the man had not previously retired. Now, I think it is a strong thing to say, in the face of those two provisions, that if a man chooses to absent himself from the force for however long a period or for whatever purposes he likes, he can claim that the twenty-five years' service can be made up of broken periods. There was one more section to which our attention was called by Mr. Shearman which shows what the scheme of the Act was. Sect. 21 refers to a man being retired without getting a pension, and again it says that: "If a constable not having been dismissed leaves a police force without a pension or gratuity, the police authority may, if it seems to them just, pay him the whole or part of the rateable deductions which have been made from his pay." Again, that is not conclusive, because Mr. Pickersgill would be entitled to say: "If a man does not claim any repayment of the deductions, he ought to be allowed when he goes on service at the latter period to add two, three, or four periods together." I agree that that is not conclusive, but it does seem to me to support the view that the Legislature was dealing with continuous service, and was therefore providing for a man going out of the service before the time when he was in a position to claim a pension. For these reasons I think that the decision of the quarter sessions was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and it is impossible to say, reading these sections, that they are consistent with the argument that any number of periods of service may be added together for the purpose of ensuring the pension. It is one of numerous instances in Acts of Parliament where by the insertion of one word the framers of the Act might have made their meaning perfectly clear, whereas in this instance, in order to see what is the meaning of the Act, it is necessary to look through the whole of the sections to see whether the service is to be a continuous service or not. If the framers of the Act had used the words "continuous service," there would have been no difficulty whatever.

KENNEDY, J.—I think it is certainly strange and also very unfortunate that the Legislature in passing this important Act has left to the administrators of the Act, or those who have to deal with it judicially, to infer from the sections indirectly that which is obviously a most important part of the scheme—namely, whether the right to pensions is dependent upon a continuous and uninterrupted service, or, as was held by the Privy Council in the case of Walker v. Simpson (sup.), the service might be made up of various terms of service with interruptions or breaks between. I am afraid that I feel a good deal more doubt than my Lord and my brother Lawrance as to the right inference to be drawn from this section. I hope it is not unreasonable that, in construing an Act of this kind, where one is admittedly driven to an interpretation on an important point by inference from various sections up and down the Act, to say that it is not absent from one's mind that the decision, from which I am not going to dissent, certainly cannot tend to enhance the popularity of the service which is of the highest importance to the community. I approach the Act with a feeling that certainly, if a man has served creditably and with merit for twenty-five years to earn a pension, there may be cases in which—as to the merits of the present case I say nothing one way or the other—an officer who for a short time may have left the service and been invited by his superior to return to it would be, I think, perhaps hardly treated in the opinion of many if the ten years or so that he has first faithfully served should not form part of the consideration in the pension which the Act allows. I feel rather pressed also by this, that I think that the view which should be taken is the view which I understand Lord Macnaghten to have given his high authority to in the case of Walker v. Simpson (sup.)—namely, that prima facie, if you serve twenty-five years under a certain head or office, you should be entitled to a pension. It was for those who say that such services must be continuous to have inserted a word which would convey that, and it would have been simple to have said, as my brother Lawrance has pointed out, “continuous service.” The absence of a phrase to qualify what has prima facie a different meaning seems to me, reading the whole of the Act, to be at any rate an inference not unjustly to be drawn in favour of the view which the appellant takes here. But it is conceded that, in order to construe an Act of Parliament of this kind rightly, you must look at the whole Act. If I find distinct provisions which certainly I am not capable of explaining, except upon the basis that those who framed it had in view continuous service, I am not prepared to dissent. I entirely agree with my Lord that it is very difficult, reading sub-sect. 5 of sect. 5 and sub-sect. 5 of sect. 4, if it was to be the basis of the Act that the service need not be continuous, to see why these provisions should be inserted which provide for the treatment as continuous service of service with certain specified breaks, because, of course, otherwise such provisions would appear to be needless. I am not prepared to dissent, therefore, from the judgment which has been pronounced by my Lord and my brother Lawrance.

BARNETT (app.) v. COVELL (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

BARNETT (app.) v. COVELL (resp.). (a)

Local government—Hoarding—“Abutting” on street.

A hoarding for advertisements 60ft. long and 12ft. above a hedge, no part of such hoarding being nearer to the street than 2ft. and having the hedge between it and the street, does not “abut” on the street.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CASE stated on an information charging the respondent for unlawfully erecting a hoarding abutting on a street, contrary to sect. 87 of the Ilfracombe Improvement Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxxiii.).

Upon hearing the information it was proved that Slade-road is a street within the limits of the Ilfracombe Improvement Act 1900, and that the respondent had without the consent of the Ilfracombe Urban District Council erected a hoarding to be used for advertising purposes in the field adjoining Slade-road. The hoarding was erected on the centre of the hedge bank, so that, as the hedge was from 4ft. to 6ft. 8in. thick, the distance from the hoarding to the foot of the hedge bank varied from 2ft. to 3ft. 4in., and the boarded part was about 60ft. in length and about 12ft. above the top of the hedge.

The appellant contended that “abutting” meant “bordering,” and that the hoarding came within the section, and he cited the following cases in support thereof: Wakefield Local Board of Health v. Lee (35 L. T. Rep. 481; 1 Ex. Div. 336) and Newport Urban Sanitary Authority v. Graham (47 L. T. Rep. 98; 9 Q. B. Div. 183).

The respondent contended that for the hoarding to abut on the street there must be a contact with the street, and that, as the hoarding was at its nearest point 2ft. away from the street, no such contact existed, and that consequently the hoarding did not abut on the street, nor did it adjoin the street, and he quoted the cases of Rex v. Hodges (Mood. & M. 341), Vale and Sons v. Moorgate, &c., Buildings Limited (80 L. T. Rep. 487), and Ind Coope v. Hamblin (84 L. T. Rep. 168).

The justices found from the evidence that the respondent had erected a hoarding for advertising purposes inside a field fronting the street known as Slade-road and parallel therewith; that about half the thickness of the hedge in the field was between the hoarding and the street, and that no part of the hoarding was nearer than 2ft. They therefore were of opinion that the hoarding did not abut on the street.

By sect. 87 of the Ilfracombe Improvement Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxxiii.) it is enacted:

(1) Every hoarding or similar structure in or abutting on or adjoining any street shall be securely erected and maintained. (2) It shall not be lawful, after the passing of this Act, to erect any hoarding or similar structure to be used either wholly or partly for advertising purposes in or abutting on or adjoining any street without the consent of the council, and such consent may be given subject to such conditions as to the submission of a plan and elevation and as to the maintenance of such hoarding as the council may determine. (3) The owner or other person using any hoarding, wall, or similar structure for advertising purposes, whether erected before or after the passing of this Act, shall at all times hereafter keep and maintain the same in proper and safe repair and condition, and in the event of any papers affixed for advertising purposes to such hoarding, wall, or other structure falling off or becoming detached shall forthwith remove and clear away such papers. (4) Any person who acts in contravention of any of the provisions of this section, or who violates any conditions or the terms of any consent given in pursuance of such provisions, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5s. and to a daily penalty not exceeding 20s. (5) Any consent or condition made under this section may be under the hands of the clerk or surveyor.

DICKINSON (app.) v. FORSYTH (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Graham Campbell for the appellant.—The word “abut” goes further than “adjoin,” and means bordering upon, and the justices ought to have convicted the respondent under sect. 87 of the statute. In Wakefield Local Board of Health v. Lee (35 L. T. Rep. 481; 1 Ex. Div. 336), where the respondent’s premises were divided from a street by a small stream, but by two bridges over the stream their premises were connected with it, it was held that the premises fronted and abutted upon this street. In Newport Urban Sanitary Authority v. Graham (47 L. T. Rep. 98; 9 Q. B. Div. 183) at the rear of the premises in question was a footpath at the end of a street which formed a cul de sac. The ground at the back of these premises was 5ft. above the level of the footpath and street and there was a wall 12ft. high, and no access existed to the footpath or street from the premises. It was, however, held that the premises adjoined or abutted on the street.

Kimber for the respondent.—This hoarding does not abut, for the word means “coming to the end or edge of,” which the case finds the hoarding does not. In order to abut on a street there must be contact with the street, but here no part of the hoarding comes within 2ft.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am very anxious not to say anything which may be construed as laying down any general rule as to the meaning of the word “abut,” for it is really a question of fact. We must take it here that a licensee has erected a hoarding on another man’s land, and that there is a continuous strip of land between the street and the support of the hoarding. Now, the Act says that no hoarding is to be erected for advertising purposes abutting on a street without the consent of the council, and it is a penal statute that must be construed strictly. No doubt if the hoarding was put back 10ft. it would be equally unsightly, but no one could contend that it abutted on the street. Here a strip was left between the hoarding and the street, and, that being so, the hoarding does not abut, for, in speaking of land, abutting means touching and adjoining. When you contrast the hoarding and the land, the land is touching and therefore abutting on the street, and the hoarding, being some way back, does not touch the street and so does not abut.

DICKINSON (app.) v. FORSYTH (resp.). (a)

Local government—By-law—Erecting shed—Neglecting to comply with notice—Sufficiency of notice.

By certain by-laws Nos. 53 and 96 it was provided that if any person should erect new domestic buildings certain open space was to be provided, and anyone who was intending to erect a building was to give notice to the council and deliver plans thereof, a description of the materials to be used, and other details.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By by-law No. 98, where a person who has erected a building or done any other work to which the by-laws apply receives a notice in writing specifying any matters in respect of which the erection or the work is in contravention of any by-law, such person must cause anything done in contravention to be amended.

A notice was served stating: “I am directed . . . to call your attention to the fact that a wooden erection has been made . . . contrary to Nos. 53 and 96 of the by-laws. . . .”

Held, that such notice was sufficient.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent for having erected a shed contrary to a certain by-law No. 53, and, having had notice requiring him to remove the same, unlawfully neglected to comply with the notice, contrary to by-law No. 98.

The following is a copy of the notice, dated the 2nd Dec. 1902, served by the surveyor of the district council and referred to in the information, and service of which on the respondent was admitted:

I am directed by this council to draw your attention to the fact that a wooden erection has been made in the back yard of your property situate at No. 20, Avondale-terrace, Chester-le-Street, contrary to Nos. 53 and 96 of the by-laws relating to new streets and buildings in force in this district, and you are hereby requested to cause the erection above referred to to be removed within twenty-one days from this date. I would further respectfully remind you that you are required by law to let me have a notice in writing if the work above referred to is completed.

The shed complained of in the information was built by the respondent, and it was also proved that the shed, which was 7ft. in height, caused the open space in the rear of the respondent’s dwelling-house to the boundary wall opposite to be less than 15ft., contrary to the by-law No. 53. It was also admitted that the shed was erected after the building of the dwelling-house had been completed, and that no plan for its erection had been previously submitted to the surveyor for the approval of the district council. And the surveyor stated on oath that he did not discover that the shed had been erected until the month of Nov. 1902, and it was further admitted that between the service of the notice of the 2nd Dec. 1902 and the laying of the information depositions from the respondent had waited on the district council, and negotiations had taken place with reference to the notice that had been served, but no conclusion had been arrived at.

It was alleged on behalf of the respondent, although no evidence was called to prove it, that the shed had been built several months prior to the notice of the 2nd Dec. 1902, and, further, that, notwithstanding the erection of the shed, there still remained an aggregate open air space at the rear of the respondent’s dwelling-house of 259 square feet, being 109 square feet beyond the requirements of by-law No. 53 in that behalf.

The respondent’s solicitor took the following objections—namely, (a) that the proceedings were not duly authorised by the district council pursuant to sect. 259 of the Public Health Act 1875; (b) that the notice of the 2nd Dec. 1902 was not given by the surveyor of the council within a reasonable time after the erection of the building as required by by-law No. 98; (c) that the notice was bad in law in that it did not, as required by by-law No. 98, specify the matters in respect of which the erection of the building was in contravention of by-laws Nos. 53 and 96, such by-laws being capable of contravention in various matters.

With regard to objection (a) the appellant stated on oath that the proceedings were authorised by the council held on the 26th Feb. 1903, at which the report of the buildings committee recommending that proceedings be taken against the respondent for breach of the by-laws was read and adopted by the council. Neither the minute-book of the council nor anything in writing was produced, but, as the proceedings were instituted by the appellant as clerk of the council, the justices were of opinion that they were duly authorised.

With regard to objection (b) there was no formal evidence given as to when the building complained of was erected by the respondent, and as the justices had decided to dismiss the case upon the point raised by the respondent's objection (c) they did not express any opinion as to whether the notice was given by the surveyor to the respondent within a reasonable time after the erection of the building, as required by by-law No. 98.

With regard to objection (c) the justices were of opinion that the notice of the 2nd Dec. 1902 was bad in law in that it did not, as required by by-law No. 98, specify the matters in respect of which the erection of the building contravened the provisions of by-laws Nos. 53 and 96 referred to in such notice, and they dismissed the information.

By the by-laws in question it was provided :

53. Every person who shall erect a new domestic building shall provide in the rear of such building an open space exclusively belonging to such building and of an aggregate extent of not less than 150 square feet and free from any erection thereon above the level of the ground except a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy and a sahpit; and he shall cause such open space to extend laterally throughout the entire width of such building, and he shall cause the distance across such open space from every part of such building to the boundary of any lands or premises immediately opposite or adjoining the site of such building to be no less in any case than 10ft. If the height of such building be 15ft. he shall cause such distance to be 15ft. at the least. If the height of such building be 25ft. he shall cause such distance to be 20ft. at the least. If the height of such building be 35ft. or exceed 35ft. he shall cause such distance to be 25ft. at the least. A person who shall make any alteration in or addition to such building shall not, by such alteration or addition, diminish the aggregate extent of open space provided in pursuance of this by-law in connection with such building, or in any other respect fail to comply with any provision of this by-law. For the purposes of this by-law the height of such building shall be measured upwards from the level of the ground over which such open space shall extend to the level of half the vertical height of the roof or to the top of the parapet, whichever may be the higher.

96. Every person who shall intend to erect a building shall give to the council notice in writing of such intention, which shall be delivered or sent to their clerk at his or their office, or to their surveyor at his or their office, and shall at the same time deliver or send or cause to be delivered or sent to their clerk at his or their office, or to their surveyor at his or their office, complete plans and sections of every floor of such intended building, which shall be drawn to a scale of not less than 1in. to every 8ft. and shall show the position, form, and dimensions of the several parts of such building and of every water-closet, earth-closet, privy, sahpit, cesspool, well, and all other appurtenances, and in which the building shall be so described as to show whether it is intended to be used as a dwelling-house or otherwise. Such person shall at the same time deliver or send or cause to be delivered or sent to the clerk of the council at his or their office or to their surveyor at his or their office a description in writing of the materials of which it is intended that such building shall be constructed and of the intended mode of drainage and means of water supply. Such person shall at the same time deliver or send or cause to be delivered or sent to the clerk to the council at his or their office or to their surveyor at his or their office a block plan of such building, which shall be drawn to a scale of not less than 1in. to every 44ft., and shall show the position of the buildings and appurtenances of the properties immediately adjoining, the width and level of the street in front and of the street (if any) in the rear of such building, the level of the lowest floor of such building, and of any yard or ground belonging thereto. Such person shall likewise show on such plan the intended lines of drainage of such buildings and the intended size, depth, and inclination of each drain; and the details of the arrangement proposed to be adopted for the ventilation of the drains.

98. In every case where a person who shall lay out or construct a street or shall erect a building, or shall execute any other work to which the by-laws relating to new streets and buildings may apply, shall at any reasonable time during the progress or after the completion of the laying out or construction of such street, or the erection of such building or the execution of such work, receive from the surveyor of the council notice in writing specifying any matters in respect of which the laying out or construction of such street, the erecting of such building, or the execution of such work may be in contravention of any by-law relating to new streets or buildings and requiring such person within a reasonable time, which shall be specified in such notice, to cause anything done contrary to any such by-law to be amended or to do anything which by any such by-law may be required to be done, but which has been omitted to be done, such person shall within the time specified in such notice comply with the several requirements thereof so far as such requirement relates to matters in respect of which the laying out or construction of such street, the erection of such building, or the execution of such work may be in contravention of any such by-law. Such person within a reasonable time after the completion of any work which may have been executed in accordance with any such requirement shall deliver or send, or cause to be delivered or sent, to the surveyor of the council, at his or their office, notice in writing of the completion of such work, and shall at all reasonable times within a period of seven days after such notice shall have been so delivered or sent afford such surveyor free access to such work for the purpose of inspection.

Simey for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We think that the justices ought to have entertained this information. By-law No. 98 says that the notice in writing must specify any matters in respect of which the work is in contravention of any by-law. The respondent was told by the notice that the erection had been made in his back yard contrary to certain specified by-laws. I think that that notice is sufficient, as it specifies the matters in respect of which the erection is "in contravention of any by-law."

Collision—River Mersey—Vessel coming out of dock—Duty to keep out of the way—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 19.A steamship coming out of Prince's Dock into the river Mersey came into collision with another steamship coming down the east side of the river in tow of two tugs.Held, that art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea did not apply, and that there was no duty on the down-coming vessel to keep out of the way.

ACTIONS for damage by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Maiorese against the owners of the steamship Sunlight, and for negligence by the owners of the Sunlight against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

About 11.15 p.m. on the 22nd Sept. 1903 a collision occurred in the river Mersey, off the north end of the Liverpool landing-stage, between the steamships Maiorese and the Sunlight.

The Maiorese was a screw steamship of 1739 tons gross register, and at the time was being moved from the Herculaneum Graving Dock to her loading berth at the Wellington Dock in charge of the two tugs Stormcock and Fighting Cock, she herself having no steam.

The Sunlight was a screw steamship of 388 tons gross register, and at the time had just left Prince's Dock, being about to proceed on a voyage from Liverpool to Swansea with a general cargo on board.

The weather was fine and clear, the wind moderate from the S.E., and the tide flood, and of the force of four to five knots an hour.

The plaintiffs' case was that the Maiorese was proceeding down the river, keeping well to the eastward of mid-channel, and making about three to four knots over the ground, both her tugs at intervals, as they passed the entrances to the various docks, sounding their whistles. The regulation lights were being duly exhibited, and the Maiorese was in charge of a duly qualified pilot.

Under these circumstances, when the Maiorese was about off the north end of the stage, and about 300 to 400 yards from it, the masthead light of a steamship, which proved to be the Sunlight, was seen in the Prince's Half Tide Dock entrance.

The Sunlight was immediately afterwards heard to blow a long blast, and rapidly came out from the entrance, showing her red light and heading about west.

As soon as the masthead light was seen, both tugs were ordered to stop their engines, and the helm of the Maiorese was put hard-a-port, but the Sunlight came on, and, although the hawsers of the tugs were slipped, struck the starboard side of the Stormcock with her stem, and then cleared her and struck the stem of the Maiorese with her port side.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with failing to give proper and sufficient notice of their intention of coming out of the dock, and with failing to keep clear of the Maiorese and her tugs. They also charged them with breach of art. 29 of the Collision Regulations.

The defendants' case was that between 10 and 11 p.m. the Sunlight was being undocked under the direction and control of the servants of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and was brought from her berth in the Trafalgar Dock to the entrance to Prince's Dock, where she was directed to wait. She was shortly afterwards ordered by the dock officials to let go and come ahead so as to proceed into the river. The ropes were therefore let go, and a long warning blast was sounded on her whistle, and she proceeded out at full speed under a hard-a-port helm. As she cleared the entrance the towing lights and green lights of the two tugs that were towing the Maiorese were seen broad off on the port bow, and about 200 to 250 yards off. As she was unable to do anything to avoid a collision, the Sunlight kept her course and speed, blowing a short blast to indicate how her helm was, but the tug Stormcock and Maiorese, instead of keeping clear of her, collided with her.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with neglecting to keep clear, not stopping and reversing, with improperly attempting to cross ahead of the Sunlight, and with navigating too close to the dock entrances. They also charged them with breach of arts. 19, 22, and 23 of the regulations, and counter-claimed for the damages suffered by their own vessel.

Arts. 19, 22, and 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows:

Art. 19. When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 22. Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

Art. 23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

By their statement of claim in the action against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board it was alleged that those on board the Sunlight were bound to and did obey the orders of the dock officials, and that they had been under their orders throughout the operation of undocking; that they were bound to obey those orders, and that the collision was caused by the negligence of the officials in ordering her to proceed out into the river when they knew, or ought to have known, that it was not safe for her to do so.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board denied in their defence that the Sunlight, at the time in question, was acting under the orders of the dock officials or other of their servants, and pleaded that if any such orders as alleged were given, they were not within the scope of the authority of their servants. They also alleged that if it was not safe for the Sunlight to proceed out into the river, those on board of her were guilty of negligence which caused or contributed to the collision by casting off and proceeding out,

Any harbour-master, dockmaster, or piermaster may direct the time and manner of any vessel coming into or going out of any dock, and also the time of opening or shutting the dock gates; and if the master of any vessel shall act contrary to the directions or neglect to obey the orders of such harbour-master, dockmaster, or piermaster, in relation to the manner of coming into or going out of such dock, or shall obstruct or hinder him in the opening or shutting of any dock gate, such master shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not exceeding twenty pounds.

Dec. 10.—BUCKNILL, J.—On the 22nd Sept., between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, a collision occurred in the river Mersey between the steamships Maiorese and Sunlight. An action was commenced on the 27th Sept. by the owners of the Maiorese against the Sunlight, and on the 28th Sept. an action was begun by the owners of the Sunlight against the Maiorese. Those actions were consolidated. On the 20th Oct. a statement of claim was delivered by the owners of the Maiorese, and on the 27th Oct. a defence and counter-claim were put in by the owners of the Sunlight. On the same day a letter was written by the solicitors for the owners of the Sunlight to the solicitor for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, drawing attention to the fact that it was alleged that improper orders had been given by the dock board's officials to those on board the Sunlight to proceed into the river, and asking what course the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board proposed to take in the matter. That was answered the next day by the solicitor to the harbour board denying liability. On the same day that that letter was received the owners of the Sunlight commenced an action against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The case of the Maiorese is that she was being moved by two tugs, the Stormcock and the Fighting Cock, from the Herculeum Graving Dock to her loading berth at the Wellington Dock. The tugs were on either bow, the Maiorese herself having no steam up, and the tide was flood of the force of about five knots. The pleaded case is that the Maiorese was being towed down well to the eastward of mid-stream, making about three to four knots over the ground. Then the pleadings allege that when the Maiorese, in charge of a compulsory pilot, was about off the north end of the Liverpool landing stage, about 300 to 400 yards off it, the masthead light of the Sunlight was seen in the Prince's Half Tide Dock entrance; that then a long blast was heard from the Sunlight, whose red light was seen, and which rapidly came out from the dock entrance, heading about west, that the tugs of the Maiorese were told to stop, and they did so and cast off, but a collision took place between the Sunlight and the Stormcock, and then the port side of the Sunlight, about in the way of the engine-room, was struck by the stem of the Maiorese, which penetrated so far into her as to leave her in a condition in which she might soon have sunk had she not been towed ashore. The defence set up by the owners of the Sunlight is that the Sunlight was in the entrance to the Prince's Dock, having been stopped there by the dock officials; that she was ordered by the dock officials to let go and come ahead; that she thereupon blew a long blast, and under a hard-a-port helm proceeded out into the river at full speed; that as soon as she cleared the entrance the towing and green lights of the tugs towing the Maiorese were seen broad off on the port bow, and about 200 to 250 yards distant; that the Sunlight kept her course and speed, blowing a short blast to indicate how her helm was, and the collision took place. In the defence the charges made against the owners of the Maiorese are that the Maiorese and her tugs neglected to keep clear of the Sunlight, and also to slacken their speed or to cast off the tow ropes or stop or reverse their engines. Then it is charged that the Maiorese and her tugs neglected to avoid crossing ahead of the Sunlight, and negligently navigated too close in to the dock entrances. It is further said that if the Sunlight came out of dock improperly, it was in obedience to the orders of the dock officials, whose orders those on the Sunlight were bound to obey. Now, as to the claim by the owners of the Sunlight against the docks and harbour board. The statement of claim alleges that the Sunlight was stopped by the authorities in the place where we know she was lying; that throughout the operation of undocking she was acting under the orders of the dock officials, which orders those on the Sunlight were, pursuant to the Mersey Dock Act, bound to obey; and that the collision was caused by the negligence of the dock officials in ordering the Sunlight to proceed out into the river at a time when they knew, or ought to have known, that it was not safe for her to do so. That is denied by the docks and harbour board in their defence. The first question I have to decide is, Where in fact did this collision take place in regard to mid-channel? The river off the landing-stage may be said, roughly, to be 1100 to 1200 yards wide, and on the part of the Maiorese it is said that she was proceeding down the river—that is to say, to the northward—in tow of these two tugs, which were ahead of her, about 300 yards off the eastern shore, or off the stage. I find as a fact that this vessel was going down with her tugs, I will not say exactly 350 to 400 yards, but very much further off the stage than the witnesses of the Sunlight allege they were. If I may put it roughly, I should say they were going down about one-third of the width of the river off, perhaps a little less, from the stage—that is to say, I believe the story told by the Maiorese. It is also probable that the hopper went down about ahead of the Maiorese, or, putting it in another way, the Maiorese went down in the wake of the hopper, which was said to have been 300 yards off the landing-stage, and that has not been denied.

THE SUNLIGHT.

[ADM.]

But there is a stronger point than that which leads me to this conclusion, and that is that the hopper had rounded and gone down inside the Maiorese and then got ahead of her. All this shows that there was much more room than the Sunlight alleges between the Maiorese and the landing-stage. The second question is, Where was the collision with regard to the bearing of the dock gates? Now, the dock gates are not in a line with the landing-stage, because at the northernmost part of the landing-stage the jetty runs N.E., and inside the line of the landing-stage and not quite N.E. of this line are the so-called two islands at the entrance to the Prince's Half Tide Dock. I am satisfied on the evidence that the collision took place about off the north end of the landing-stage, and a little northerly of that—that is to say, if a line is drawn from the jetty about one-third of its way up and taken about west, that would be about the place where the collision happened. The third question is this: Could those on the Sunlight have seen the lights of the tugs or tow whilst the Sunlight was still in the half-tide gateway? This has been a very important question to decide—one not free from difficulty, and one upon which a great deal depends. The matter stands in this way: The Sunlight, which is 194ft. long or thereabouts, had been stopped by the dockmaster in what I may call the first position—that is to say, she would be further in, or further from the river, than in the second position. Could those on the Sunlight—that is, anybody in authority at the moment for the purpose of looking out—the master on the bridge, or the look-out man forward—have seen in the first position the lights either of the tugs or one of them, or of the tow, or the lights of all three? If either the master on the bridge or the man forward could have seen the towing lights of one of the tugs, or the side-lights of one of the tugs, or the starboard side-light of the Maiorese, that would be quite enough, because he would be able to see there were moving lights in the river coming towards the north. In spite of what has been said by the dockmaster, who was not sure whether in the first position the look-out man on the fore-castle head, or the master on the bridge, could have seen these lights, I am of opinion that one of them could have seen them; in other words, I find that in position No. 1 all the lights of the tugs and tow would not be concealed from both the look-out man forward and the master on the bridge. They might be concealed from one, but they would be open to the other, and it must be remembered that the lights on the jetty, &c., which have been referred to, would be stationary, and these lights of the tugs and tow were all moving; and it is clearly the duty of the master or the look-out men of a vessel which is in dock and about to go out into the river to watch for moving lights. But that does not conclude the case at all, because there is the position No. 2 of the Sunlight, when the Sunlight had come more towards the river, but not into it, with her starboard check-rope made fast to the third or fourth bollard, and there was a moment when that rope led aft. If the Sunlight is put into that position and is stationary, with her engines still at rest, I am satisfied beyond all doubt that then the look-out man on the Sunlight must have seen, if he had looked, the lights of the tugs, or, at all events, of the Stormcock, and, I believe, the starboard light of the Maiorese. He saw nothing. I find as a fact they could have been seen. They were seen by others. The dockmaster says he saw them himself, but he is not quite certain of the position in which he was when he saw them, and therefore I do not place much weight upon his evidence on that point. But I find as a fact that the man who was placed on the corner of the knuckle to the northward of the dock entrance did see, and did report, not only the lights of the hopper, but the lights of the vessels which were coming down astern of her. The master of the Sunlight said that if the down-coming ship, the Maiorese, and her tugs were where it is alleged by the plaintiffs they were—that is to say, not 150 yards, but between 300 and 400 yards off the landing-stage—those on the Sunlight ought to have seen them. Finding, as I do, that these vessels coming down were from 300 to 350 yards off, and that their lights were reported by the look-out man on the knuckle, I have come to the conclusion of fact that those on board the Sunlight could have seen the lights of the down-coming ship. It does not follow that they did not see them, though they said they did not. The next question is, Could the Sunlight have avoided the collision after she was in the river? This is a question with regard to which I rely upon the judgment of those who sit here to assist me on nautical matters. I have asked the Elder Brethren this question, Could the Sunlight, by the exercise of reasonable care and skill, have avoided this collision? I am advised by them, and I have no doubt of it myself, that by the exercise of reasonable skill the Sunlight might have avoided the collision after she got into the river. There was, in my opinion, and I am so advised, ample room and opportunity for the collision to have been avoided if, instead of keeping on full speed ahead under hard-a-port helm, the engines had been stopped and reversed, and the helm not kept hard-a-port, but eased off, so that she would have been then drifting up, broadside, to the southward. There would have been plenty of room between her and the down-coming ships. I am also advised that she might have done something else. After she came out into the river her head was N.W. by W., and when she struck the Stormcock her head was W. by S., so that she had altered four points. If, instead of keeping on under hard-a-port helm, she had hard-a-starboarded her helm and had altered two or three points, she would have been able to have gone, the tide being with her, up river to the southward, and in all probability clear of the Maiorese and her tugs. But I am not so firm on this point as I am on the first. I am advised that there were two ways in which the collision could have been avoided; but I prefer to put my judgment upon the first. Not taking such steps was negligence on the part of the master of the Sunlight, who in all probability thought that the starboard-side rule applied, and that he was justified in keeping on full speed ahead under hard-a-port helm, and that it was the duty of the other vessel to keep out of his way. I do not consider that art. 19—that is, the starboard-side rule—applied. I find that the Sunlight was negligently navigated, and had a bad look-out, which contributed to the collision. But did it not cause it entirely? I am of opinion that it did. It is alleged in the pleadings that the Maiorese might have done something to avoid the collision, but I find as a fact that she could not have done anything more than was done. Those in charge of the Maiorese ordered the tugs to stop, and they did stop as soon as they saw this other vessel coming down. The next question I have to determine is whether the excuse pleaded by the Sunlight is good in law or in fact. The owners of the Sunlight, having made the dock board defendants to the action brought by them, allege that if the navigation of the Sunlight was negligent it was the fault of the dockmaster in ordering the vessel out into the river at a time when he ought not to have done so. That is a mixed question of fact and law. I have no doubt that the dockmaster had, under the Act of Parliament, power to order a ship, which has paid her dues and is ready to go, to leave the premises of the dock board. But, though that is the legal position, looking at it generally, one must apply the facts in each particular case. First of all, as a fact, did he order the Sunlight out? I am satisfied that the dockmaster did not order the vessel out, or say anything which amounted to an order. I find that, in fact, no order was given by the dockmaster to the Sunlight to go out, and that the master of the vessel went out at his own risk, and navigated his own ship out—not against the order of the dockmaster, the dockmaster could not stop him; but he cast off his own rope, by his own men, who were there for the purpose, by his order; and I find as a fact that the dockmaster did point out to him and warn him of the lights of the down-coming ship. The probable solution of this case is that the master of the Sunlight wanted to get to sea and miscalculated the strength of the tide, and, having cleared the hopper, satisfied himself that he could clear the other vessel too, and so ran the risk. The result must be that the Sunlight as against the Maiorese is solely to blame, and that the owners of the Sunlight must lose their case against the dock board because they have not made good the allegations contained in their statement of claim.

Re GIST. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE MASTER IN LUNACY.

Lunacy—Administration of lunatic's property—Permanent additions to and improvements of freehold estates—Orders for payment of expenditure out of personal estate—Jurisdiction—Lunacy Act 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 118.

Sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 gives the court jurisdiction to make a charge upon the real estate of a lunatic for the whole or any part of any moneys expended under a previous order for the permanent improvement, security, or advantage of such property, unless in making the previous order the judge had that section before his mind and deliberately exercised the jurisdiction conferred by it. If the jurisdiction has been exercised once when the original order was made it cannot afterwards be exercised a second time.

Decision of Master Fischer reversed.

SAMUEL GIST, a person of unsound mind, whose property was being administered in Lunacy, was tenant in tail in possession of certain estates situate in the counties of Gloucester, Worcester, Oxford, Warwick, and Northampton.

He was also absolutely entitled as owner in fee to an estate called the Alston estate; and was possessed of certain personal property.

The lunatic had not any child.

The estates having fallen into a bad state of repair, a survey was directed, and it appeared that it was desirable to effect various repairs and permanent improvements of the estates.

Accordingly by an order dated the 4th June 1877 (reported sub nom. Re Gist, 5 Ch. Div. 881) it was (amongst other things) ordered that the amounts (not exceeding 5726*l.*) to be expended in the permanent improvement of the estates of which the lunatic was tenant in tail in possession were to be a charge with interest on the particular estate so improved, and that such charges were to be made by way of mortgage for a term of years, without power of sale or foreclosure during the lifetime of the lunatic, to a trustee or trustees for securing to the personal estate of the lunatic the amounts to be so expended, together with a moiety of the surveyor's charges, and the costs, charges, and expenses therein mentioned.

By another order dated the 3rd June 1886 it was (amongst other things) ordered that, for the purpose of the charges by the order of the 4th June 1877 directed, the same should, notwithstanding the directions of such order, be made by way of mortgage of the entirety of the freehold estates of which the lunatic was seised for an estate tail for a term of years, without power of sale or foreclosure during the lifetime of the lunatic, to a trustee or trustees for securing to the personal estate of the lunatic the sum of 12,453*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pursuant to the last-mentioned order a mortgage was executed on the 7th Sept. 1886 whereby the estates whereof the lunatic was tenant in tail in possession were mortgaged to certain persons for a term of 1000 years for securing payment to them as trustees for the lunatic as part of his personal estate of 12,453*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* with interest from the death of the lunatic.

Pursuant to orders made on the 20th Jan. and the 20th March 1888 in that behalf the estates were, by an indenture of mortgage dated the 25th Nov. 1890, further mortgaged to the same persons as such trustees as aforesaid for the further sum of 524*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* with interest from the death of the lunatic, being the further amount expended upon the permanent improvement of the estates and a moiety of the costs, charges, and expenses as therein mentioned.

By an order dated the 14th March 1894 it was (amongst other things) ordered that the then committee of the estate of the lunatic should be at liberty to execute the proposed repairs to the several farmhouses and buildings specified in his affidavit sworn in the matter, the cost of which repairs was estimated to amount to about 521*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*

This expenditure was by the same order directed to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of timber thereby authorised to be felled.

By an order dated the 20th June 1896 the committee was (amongst other things) authorised to expend the further sum of 466*l.* 13*s.* upon the repairs and for the new fencing specified in the schedule thereto; and by another order dated the 25th June 1897 the committee was (amongst other things) authorised to expend the further sum of 305*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* upon the repairs specified in part 1 of the 1st schedule thereto. This order authorised the felling and sale of timber by the committee.

By an order dated the 12th May 1898 the committee was (amongst other things) authorised to expend a sum not exceeding 140*l.* in substantially repairing or rebuilding the cattle sheds upon a farm which formed part of the lunatic's estate. This expenditure was by the same order authorised to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of timber thereby authorised to be felled.

By an order dated the 1st Aug. 1900 it was (amongst other things) ordered that the then committee should be at liberty to expend a sum not exceeding 1400*l.* in carrying out the repairs and improvements referred to in his affidavit sworn in the matter. The order contained no express direction in terms as to the application of any particular fund for the purposes of the order, but it directed payment to the committee of amounts out of funds in court more than sufficient for the expenditure authorised.

On the 9th July 1901 directions were given to the committee authorising the expenditure of the further sum of 478*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* for certain improvements and repairs upon the estate of the lunatic specified in the summons issued in the matter and dated the 6th July 1901.

All of the above-mentioned orders were made in the presence of the next of kin and the heir-at-law of the lunatic (the heir-at-law being also the next tenant in tail of the settled estates), and had hitherto been acquiesced in by the next of kin.

The orders of the 14th March 1894 and subsequent thereto were not made under the jurisdiction conferred by sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890; and no mention was made therein that they were to be without prejudice to the question as to how the expenditure was ultimately to be borne as between the real estate and the personal estate.

The moneys which appeared from the committee's accounts to have been actually expended upon the repairs and improvements authorised by the orders and directions of the 14th March 1894, the 20th June 1896, the 25th June 1897, the 12th May 1898, the 1st Aug. 1900, and the 9th July 1901 amounted in the aggregate to the sum of 3010*l.* odd, all of which moneys had been paid out of the personal estate of the lunatic.

The moneys which similarly appeared to have been actually expended under the orders and directions of the 14th March 1894, the 12th May 1898, the 1st Aug. 1900, and the 9th July 1901 upon permanent additions to and improvements of the freehold estates of which the lunatic was seised in fee simple or as tenant in tail in possession amounted in the aggregate to the sum of 1244*l.* odd, all of which moneys had been paid out of the personal estate of the lunatic.

These moneys, it was alleged, had been so expended in addition to the ordinary repairs and maintenance of the lunatic's estates, and in respect of substantial and permanent additions and improvements thereto; and it was now contended by the next of kin of the lunatic that such moneys should be charged upon the estates which had been so improved in favour of the personal estate of the lunatic out of which the same were in the first instance paid and expended.

A summons was accordingly taken out by two of the next of kin of the lunatic on behalf of themselves and all other persons entitled in distribution to his personal estate asking for an order that the sum of 1244*l.* odd so expended by the committee upon permanent additions to and improvements of the freehold estates of which the lunatic was seised as tenant in tail in possession, together with the sum of 635*l.* odd, representing a moiety of the costs, charges, and expenses in the matter from the 20th March 1888 to date, might be a charge with interest upon those freehold estates, and that such charge should be made by way of mortgage for a term of years, without power of sale or foreclosure during the lifetime of the lunatic, to trustees for securing to the personal estate of the lunatic the said sums of 1244*l.* odd and 635*l.* odd respectively with interest for the same from the day of the death of the lunatic at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

The summons came on to be heard before Master Fischer, who made an order on the 8th Dec. 1903, under sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 (which order had not yet been drawn up and entered), whereby it was in substance ordered and declared that the freehold estates of which the lunatic was seised as tenant in tail in possession should stand charged with such sum as the master should certify (in default of agreement between the parties to the application on which the order was made) to have been expended by the committee of the lunatic in permanent improvements on the freehold estates, together with a moiety of the costs, charges, and expenses subsequent to the taxation directed by the order of the 20th March 1888, and whereby consequential directions were given for the creation and execution of a mortgage upon the freehold estates to trustees for securing to the personal estate of the lunatic the amount of such charge.

From that decision the heir-at-law of the lunatic now appealed, asking that Master Fischer's order might be discharged and that no order should be made upon the summons except as to costs.

On the 12th Jan. 1904 the appeal was brought before Williams, L.J. sitting in Lunacy in chambers, but without discussion it was adjourned by his Lordship to the full court, and now came on to be heard.

Younger, K.C. (with him Wace), for the appellant, stated the facts of the case and the question raised. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Henry Terrell, K.C. and H. B. Howard for the respondents.—[WILLIAMS, L.J.—Do you say that sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 gives the court power to determine how these improvements shall be dealt with, even if without that section we have not the power?] Yes; we submit that that section applies here and gives the court the necessary power, and we ask the court to exercise that power. But we also say that the power has been effectively exercised by the previous orders, and that really the matter is res judicata. In any case, even if the court is not satisfied that sect. 118 is sufficient authority, we rely upon the inherent jurisdiction of the court to determine how these improvements shall be dealt with, and whether they shall be paid for out of the personal estate or out of the real estate of the lunatic. The real estate is large and the personal estate is small, and, if the personal estate is to be applied, it will be a great hardship upon the next of kin of the lunatic. The real estate is settled, but the lunatic is absolutely entitled to the personal estate. It is entirely for the benefit of the lunatic that the property to which he is absolutely entitled should be increased as much as possible; and the personal estate will be increased if the real estate bears the expenses of the improvements in question. Therefore we submit that Master Fischer's order of the 8th Dec. 1903 was right; and that the real estate ought to bear its proper burden. The question as to the circumstances under which the court may review its own orders was discussed in Re Swire; Mellor v. Swire, 53 L. T. Rep. 205; 30 Ch. Div. 239, at p. 243.

See also

Annual Practice 1904, p. 357.

Master Fischer did in effect vary his own orders previously made. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Order XXVIII., r. 11.] There was, we submit, an "accidental slip or omission" here within the meaning of that rule. [WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that that means an "accidental slip or omission" on the part of the court, but on the part of its ministerial officer in drawing up the order.] We are not so much relying upon that rule as upon the inherent jurisdiction of the court to review its own orders. [STIRLING, L.J.—That rule confers upon the court a power which it did not previously possess. It provides that: "Clerical mistakes in judgments or orders, or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission, may at any time be corrected by the court or a judge on motion or summons without an appeal." [WILLIAMS, L.J.—The necessity for the rule arose out of the requirements of the Judicature Acts: (see Re St. Nazaire Land Company, 41 L. T. Rep. 110; 12 Ch. Div. 88). The rule was introduced to meet the difficulty to which the decision in that case gave rise. COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—It was introduced for the purpose of allowing a blunder of a ministerial officer of the court to be amended.] Is it not competent for the court to correct a mistake in its own order where such order does not carry out precisely what the court intended that it should carry out? See hereon the observations of Lord Watson in

[STIRLING, L.J. referred to the observations of Lord Selborne in Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury (58 L. T. Rep. 192; 12 App. Cas. 672) and WILLIAMS, L.J. to the observations of Lord Penzance in Lawrie v. Lees (46 L. T. Rep. 210; 7 App. Cas. 19, at pp. 34, 35). His Lordship added: In Re Swire; Mellor v. Swire (ubi sup.) the statement on p. 240 of 30 Ch. Div. shows that when the court speaks of the intention of the court it does not mean anything more than the intention appearing from the words that were actually delivered.] Then we say that, if the master had no jurisdiction to alter the previous orders, this is merely administration of the estate. The court can always adjust accounts as between the tenant for life and remaindermen and income and capital, and put right what was wrongly done before. In Re Gist (5 Ch. Div. 881) the intention was to make the real estate of the lunatic bear the expense of the improvements, and, in carrying out the administration of the lunatic's estate, the court has jurisdiction to adjust the error it made in the orders subsequent to that decision. [WILLIAMS, L.J.—Has the master in exercising the jurisdiction in Lunacy a right of rehearing, or have the Judicature Acts in taking away the right of rehearing destroyed that right as regards Lunacy jurisdiction?] That we cannot at present say. As to what improvements are authorised, see Wolstenholme's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts, 8th edit., p. 352.

Younger, K.C. in reply.—With reference to the question last put, the Lunacy Rules, rr. 10 and 11, show what the jurisdiction of the master is under the circumstances referred to. It is said by the respondents that, even if Master Fischer had no jurisdiction to make the order of the 8th Dec. 1903, they pray in aid the power conferred by sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890. That is a discretionary section, and it is not surprising that it is not relied upon very strongly. Prima facie, permanent improvements are to be charged upon the estate improved. The practice appears from the case of Oxenden v. Lord Compton (2 Ves. Jun. 69, at p. 72), where it was laid down by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Loughborough) that you cannot raise a question as to the property of a lunatic as between the heir-at-law and the next of kin. [WILLIAMS, L.J.—Is that not affected by sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890?] I submit not, having regard to sect. 116, sub-sect. 4, which is the introductory section subject to which all the succeeding sections are to be read. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—There is nothing analogous to that in the Act of 1853.] No; it is an entirely new section. Sect. 118 differs from sect. 123. The latter section leaves no discretion in anyone. The old Act of 1853 contained similar sections. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Re Badcock (4 My. & C. 440).] The observations of Lord Macnaghten in Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury (at p. 688 of 12 App. Cas.) are to the same effect as in Re Badcock (ubi sup.) Sect. 118 and the jurisdiction thereunder, instead of being a matter of ordinary course, is a matter of special administration. It relates to something extraordinary, and that is not what happened in the present case. Then it is a circumstance not to be overlooked that in the case of the first two orders the fund out of which these repairs and improvements were to be effected was a fund created by the sale of timber. [STIRLING, L.J. referred to Shelford on Lunacy, citing the case of Re Harris (unreported).] Lord Eldon in Ex parte Phillips (19 Ves. 118) held that there was no equity for a charge in favour of the next of kin of a lunatic, the land tax on whose estate had been redeemed by order out of the produce of timber which had been felled. Unless, therefore, it is established that the improvements are of an extraordinary character and outside the ordinary administration of the lunatic's estate, prima facie they will not be a charge on the real estate, and will be dealt with out of the personal estate. The orders up to the present date were not ultra vires, but were made in the course of the regular administration of the lunatic's estate. Then it is suggested that the orders are in the nature of interim orders. As to that contention, the orders speak for themselves. They were made in the presence of the next of kin and of the heir-at-law, and were not intended to be temporary orders, but to determine as between those parties out of what parts of the lunatic's estate the expenditure was to be paid. What is now sought is this: Years after the expenditure has been incurred and many persons concerned are dead, the court is asked to exercise its discretion in regard to that expenditure. That was the difficulty which appeared to the court in the Irish case of

It is only in exceptional circumstances that the court will review an order which has been made so long ago as these orders were made when the court is asked to exercise its jurisdiction under sect. 118 in the interests of the lunatic. But the lunatic is said to be in articulo mortis, and in any event he cannot live long. Under the Act it is the benefit of the lunatic alone that the court is to consider. That was so under the Act of 1853, and it is so under the Act of 1890. It cannot be said that it is in the interests of the lunatic here that the present application is made. It is made solely in the interests of the applicants—the next of kin. And whether there is or is not jurisdiction to rehear the orders at the instance and for the sole benefit of the next of kin, I submit that no case is made out under the circumstances for an alteration of the orders in their favour.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order of Master Fischer, dated the 8th Dec. 1903, which raises rather a curious question. The lunatic, Samuel Gist, is tenant in tail of very considerable freehold estates situated in the Midlands. He has been a lunatic for many years, and his property has been administered in Lunacy, and this is not the first occasion upon which questions arising in respect of this administration have been before the court. There was a question before the court as long ago as the year 1877, which is reported under the name of Re Gist (5 Ch. Div. 881), and I shall have to refer to that decision later on. But the question which is raised in the present case is this: There has been a series of orders made with regard to the raising and expenditure of money in respect of repairs of one character and another on these estates. It is suggested that some of these repairs which have been done have partaken of the nature of permanent improvements. Now, when these various orders were made they were such that the money was ordered to be raised out of the personal property of the lunatic; and it was out of the personal property that the expenses were accordingly paid. I may take as an example the order of the 14th March 1894. That order runs as follows: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] Well, the object of the present summons and of the order of the 8th Dec. 1903, with which we have now to deal, really was to charge this expenditure or part of this expenditure upon the real estate as having been expenditure upon permanent improvements which as between those entitled in the future to the real estate and those entitled in the future as next of kin to the personal estate ought, it is said, to be charged upon the real estate. We have gone to a certain extent into the authorities before the Lunacy Act 1853 and the present Act of 1890, with regard to the practice of those who had to administer the jurisdiction in Lunacy, and how far they would in the course of administration of the lunatic's estate have to go into the equities as between the next of kin and the heir-at-law of the real estate constituting the property of the lunatic. But I do not myself think that that practice is of very great importance now, because, whatever that practice was, it seems to me that it has been modified by the subsequent legislation. Generally, the Act of 1890, by sect. 118, reproduces the legislation under the Act of 1853. The section of that Act were the same number as the section of the Act of 1890. The material sections run in that Act from sects. 116 to 118. I shall assume for the purpose of my present judgment that, whatever may have been the practice in Lunacy or the jurisdiction in Lunacy previously to the passing of the legislation to which I have referred, yet after the passing of the Act of 1853 it was competent for those administering the jurisdiction in Lunacy to entertain this question as between the next of kin and the heir-at-law of a lunatic, and to dispose of the same. Indeed, in my view of the decision of Bagdollay, L.J. in Re Gist (ubi sup.), it is tolerably manifest that he intended so to do. It seems to me that having certain repairs and permanent improvements to provide for, and some of these repairs and permanent improvements being in respect of the estates of which the lunatic was owner in fee and some being in respect of estates of which he was tenant in tail in possession, the Lord Justice dealt with the costs of such repairs and permanent improvements differently in the case of those two estates. He makes an order for a charge in respect of the repairs and permanent improvements of the settled estates upon those settled estates. But in respect of the repairs and permanent improvements done to the Alston estate of which the lunatic was owner in fee the Lord Justice made no such order. Under these circumstances the inference which I draw is that the Lord Justice really did, in arriving at that conclusion, consider not only the benefit of the lunatic, but also what was fair to the future owners of those two estates. Under those circumstances I assume, for the purposes of my judgment, that there is such a power under sect. 118 of the Act of 1890 and that when the order of the 14th March 1894 and the subsequent orders were made, it was within the power of the master or judge to have taken these matters into consideration, and to have determined this question having regard not only to the benefit of the lunatic, but also to what was fair and right as between the expectant owners of the real estate and the personal estate respectively. I propose to deal with this case upon that footing, and upon the admission of the appellant's counsel that, so far as they are concerned, they are not prepared in any way to suggest that, when these orders were made, the master in Lunacy did in fact take into consideration the question as between the personalty and the real estate independently of the immediate benefit of the lunatic. Now, if that is so, and if one looks at the orders and finds that the orders are consistent, so far as the words are concerned, with the master not having taken sect. 118 of the Act of 1890 into consideration, then I think that we ought to look at sect. 118 and see what can be properly done after the making of these orders in exercise of the jurisdiction in Lunacy. Notwithstanding the case of Re Swire; Mellor v. Swire (53 L. T. Rep. 205; 30 Ch. Div. 239), which was much urged upon us, in my judgment, if these orders had made it clear that this question was really dealt with by the master at the time of his making the orders respectively, we should in my opinion have, or the master in Lunacy would have had, no jurisdiction which we or he could properly exercise under sect. 118 of the Act of 1890. I think that when once the jurisdiction given by that section has been exercised by the master or the judge, and that the fact of its exercise has been made manifest before the orders, the jurisdiction cannot be exercised a second time. I do not think that there would be any power to make the order which the master has made in the present case if it were clear on the face of the former orders that that was the true state of the case. But for the present purpose I am assuming that there is nothing in those former orders which shows that the master did have this question before him. On that view, when one turns to the words of sect. 118, one finds that it empowers a judge to order that the "whole or any part of any moneys expended or to be expended under his order for the permanent improvement, security, or advantage of the property of the lunatic, or any part thereof, shall, with interest, be a charge upon the improved property or any other property of the lunatic, but so that no right of sale or foreclosure during the lifetime of the lunatic be conferred by the charge." Then the section goes on to provide that the income shall be kept down during the lunatic's lifetime, out of the income of the general estate, as far as the same is sufficient to bear it; and that "the charge may be made either to some person advancing the money, or, if the money is paid out of the lunatic's general estate, to some person as a trustee for him, as part of his personal estate." It seems to me that the construction of this section is as was pointed out by Stirling, L.J. in the course of the argument. And I think that the master, in the absence of any order which had already exercised this jurisdiction, would have the power to exercise it subsequently—in other words, by making an order in respect of moneys already expended under a previous order. In the first place I agree with the observations of Lord St. Leonards in 1844 in the Irish case which has been cited of Lord Leitrim v. Enery (6 Ir. Eq. Rep. 357, at p. 369). I think that this jurisdiction is a jurisdiction which should not be exercised after a considerable lapse of time. It seems to me that it is a jurisdiction the exercise of which ought to be asked for promptly; and that in this case, the next of kin having chosen ever since the date of these orders to stand by and acquiesce therein, which prima facie threw the incidence of these expenses and costs upon the personal estate, ought not to be readily listened to coming here at this distance of time and asking us to alter the incidence of those expenses and costs. Speaking for myself, I think that if the lunatic had died—as it is said that he will very likely do shortly—before this order had been made it is very doubtful whether the jurisdiction would have continued in those who exercised it. Be that, however, as it may, in my judgment these persons have come forward too late to make this application. But I should be sorry to decide this appeal upon that ground alone. It is not, indeed, necessary in this case to rely upon that narrow ground. We have before us the affidavits and the orders, and we know what the nature of the repairs and permanent improvements was which were done under these various orders. And it is common ground that the great bulk of this work was work which was properly paid for out of the personal estate of the lunatic. But it is suggested that with regard to one or two of the items, which came to a very small proportion of the total sum expended, they were in the nature of permanent improvements which the real estate ought to bear. I take the strongest instance, which was the conversion of a malthouse into cottages. It is said that that is like the purchase of new estates, and like the instance which is mentioned by Lord Cottenham in Re Badcock (4 My. & C. 440), and that that is expenditure which ought to be charged upon the real estate. I cannot agree. As was said by the appellant's counsel—and as it seems to me—in dealing with these matters we must take into consideration the magnitude of the estate and nature of the estate. It may very well be the case that, in the ordinary course of things in the management of a large agricultural estate such as this, it became necessary in the ordinary course of management to expend money as each new tenant might require as a condition of taking the lease. We know from the affidavits that in fact this was the way in which this alteration from malthouse to cottages actually came about. It seems to me that such expenditure is expenditure which, in the ordinary course of the management of this estate, is essential to be paid for out of the rents and profits of the estate. It is not such an expenditure as one would be disposed in the exercise of this jurisdiction to order to be made a charge upon the realty. The very instance which I have just taken seems to me to go to show very strongly how unfortunate it would be to allow an order of that sort to be made after such a great time has elapsed from the original orders. We are not in a position now to ascertain all the facts about this expenditure and its nature. But among other things it is worthy to remark that the master had before him the fact that of the moneys to be provided for this expenditure a considerable part came from the cutting of timber on the entailed estates. The master may very well have thought that under those circumstances, in the absence of any objection, it was a reasonable order to make that this expenditure should be provided for in the way it was. Be that as it may, I do not think that, having regard to the small proportion that the expenditure which it is suggested should be thrown on the real estate bears to the total expenditure, we ought, after this long lapse of time since the orders were made, to authorise such an order as that of the 8th Dec. 1903 to stand. It seems to me, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed, and I put it on the two short grounds which I have mentioned—namely, first, because it is an order which ought not to have been made after this long lapse of time; and, secondly, because, even giving the go-by to the long lapse of time, I am of opinion that, looking to the nature of these repairs and improvements, the order of the master for the immediate payment of this expenditure and of these costs out of the lunatic's personal estate would be a perfectly reasonable and proper order, if this matter now came before us for the first time. With regard to the general costs incurred in the lunacy—one moiety of which the summons asked to be thrown on the real estate—it was hardly contended that in the circumstances of the case sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 had any application. And in my opinion it is impossible that the incidence of these costs should be dealt with or altered at all. I think that the master's order was clearly wrong on that point. It would be impossible to say, if the incidence of these repairs related partly to the real estate and partly to the personal estate, that therefore the right order would be to divide the costs between the real and personal estate. I do not think so. The appeal must be allowed and the order of the master discharged. The costs will be costs in the lunacy.

Re GIST.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think that the appeal ought to be allowed. The order which was made by the master gives the lunatic a charge upon certain settled estates, of which the lunatic is tenant in tail in possession, for sums which under four orders have been expended in permanent improvements of those estates. Now, the principles upon which the court acts with reference to such matters are very clearly stated by Lord Macnaghten in Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury (58 L. T. Rep. 192, at p. 195; 12 App. Cas. 672, at p. 688). He says: "The principles on which the court acts in dealing with the property of lunatics under its care are not open to question. The leading principle, the paramount consideration, is the interest of the lunatic. Consistently with that principle it is settled that, in the ordinary course of managing a lunatic's estate, the court pays no regard to the interests or expectations of those who may come after; but it is equally well settled, that, in matters outside the ordinary course of management, it is the duty of the court, so far as may be possible, not to alter the character of the lunatic's property, or to interfere with any rights of succession." Then the learned judge quotes a passage from Lord Loughborough's judgment in Oxenden v. Lord Compton (2 Ves. 69), when he was commenting on Lord Bathurst's judgment in Ex parte Grimstone (4 Bro. C. C. 235n.; Amb. 706), as follows: "'If the Chancellor was continually looking to the right and left and weighing the probable interest of the representatives, the interest of the lunatic would be committed in favour of those who have no immediate interest, and whose contingent interests are left to the ordinary course of events. Therefore the Chancellor is to administer the estate tanquam bonus pater familias, making every advantage fairly to increase and improve it without engaging in risks and dangerous adventures, for those are not fit enterprises. But whatever leads towards ordinary improvement it is strictly the duty of the administrator to do, considering only the immediate interest of the proprietor of the estate. But when I am laying down this so generally I must be understood to do it with this guard, that great care must be taken that nothing extraordinary is to be attempted, as estates to be bought or interests to be disposed of. Alteration of property is, as far as possible, to be avoided consistently with the idea of preserving the interest of the proprietor.'" The rule there laid down is that it is the duty of the court, so far as possible, in matters outside the ordinary course of management not to interfere with or alter the devolution of a lunatic's property. And the illustrations given by Lord Loughborough are cases where property is to be bought or sold. The application of that rule, however, is not limited to cases of purchase and sale. It has long been settled, as appears from Re Harris (unreported), cited in Shelford on Lunacy, that, where it was absolutely necessary to expend money in rebuilding, the court would order that the sum expended should be taken as charged on the lunatic's real estate. And in Re Badcock (ubi sup.), to which my Lord has already referred, Lord Cottenham said that, "if the money were laid out in the purchase of land, or, what would amount to the same thing, in building a farmhouse, it would be right that the sum so laid out should retain its character of personalty." Now, it is sought on behalf of the next of kin of the lunatic to bring the present case within those decisions to which I have last referred, so that the court ought to say that there has been expenditure of an extraordinary kind made which would give them a right to say that there has been something in the nature of an alteration of the property, and that an order might be made under sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890 giving the lunatic a charge upon the settled estates for the amount of the expenditure. Now, it is to be observed that all these orders were made in the presence of the heir-at-law and of the next of kin. They had therefore an opportunity of pointing out to the master at the time when the orders were made

HARROGATE CORPORATION v. DICKINSON.

that the expenditure was of an extraordinary nature, and of calling upon him to exercise the jurisdiction which the court has of altering the devolution of the property, or of leaving the question open for future decision by inserting a few words in the orders to the effect that they were to be without prejudice as to how the expenditure was ultimately to be borne. Nothing of that kind, however, was inserted in the orders. They simply contain a direction to the committee to expend the money. That being so, it seems to me that the burden lies on the present applicants—the next of kin—to make out that extraordinary expenditure has taken place. Now, I confess that it seems to me that the evidence in support of that contention is of a very shadowy description. There are only a few items which bear the aspect of being at all extraordinary. The greater part of the expenditure sanctioned by these orders was simply for repairs of an ordinary character. In the first order, which is that of the 14th March 1894, the sum expended in alterations and repairs was 600*l.*, and of that the item which was pointed to was one, estimated at 150*l.*, for the conversion of a malthouse into cottages, one of the terms on which the tenant of the farm took the lease being that this should be done in order to increase the accommodation for labourers. That is stated in the affidavit of the committee filed in support of the order which was then made, and that is all that is said in the matter. And it is said very fairly that the master might have treated it as an ordinary case of management of the property, and one not calling for the exercise of any discretion on his part. The other instances are really weaker, and, upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the applicants have not made out that which it was necessary for them to make out, that there has been such expenditure as to bring the case within the rule which applies to what is outside the ordinary course of management. That being so, it seems to me that the application fails. I will only add that if it were proved that the court had not exercised a jurisdiction which is undoubtedly vested in it of altering the nature of the property so as to change its devolution, it would in my opinion be open to the court to make an order under sect. 118 of the Act of 1890. But if the jurisdiction is once exercised and the court has decided that the power vested in it to alter the nature of the property ought not to be exercised, then the court cannot go back upon its own order and make such an order as is asked for by the present summons.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question before us is not one of amending the old orders. No such application as that ought to be listened to for a moment. The real question arises under sect. 118 of the Lunacy Act 1890. That section gives the court jurisdiction to make a charge upon the real estate of the lunatic for the moneys expended under its order for the permanent improvement of the property of the lunatic, unless in making that order the judge or master had that section before his mind and deliberately exercised the jurisdiction conferred by it. In the present case I am not satisfied that any one of the four orders in question is of such a nature as to prevent us from now exercising the jurisdiction under sect. 118. I do not hold the narrow view of sect. 118 taken by counsel for the appellant, that the court cannot make a charge unless for the benefit of the lunatic. Any such contention seems to me to be negatived by Baggally, L.J. in the former case arising in this lunacy of Re Gist (5 Ch. Div. 881). Assuming, however, that we have jurisdiction, there are two grounds which are said to prevent our exercise of that jurisdiction. The first is delay. I do not attach much importance to that, as nothing has been done which would alter the position of the parties. But the other consideration, which really influences my mind, is that, in exercising the jurisdiction under sect. 118, regard must be had to the nature and extent of the lunatic's estate. It is an estate the rental of which was 5000*l.* a year, though it is now reduced to some 3500*l.* In approaching a question of this sort, regard should be had to this fact, that it is almost, if not quite, impossible to draw a clear line between what are repairs and what are permanent improvements. And we are asked to say that certain items on the border line must be regarded as improvements and cannot be considered as repairs. Now, there are three items only that need be referred to. The strongest in favour of the appellant was the conversion of the malthouse into cottages. The second was a new iron wheel in place of a wooden wheel; and the third was a new roof to an old barn. I am not clear that one single item is not of such a nature that the master could not have rightly said under sect. 118 that it was not the subject of a charge on the real estate. Speaking generally, it is a good rule that the masters in Lunacy in making an order for improvements should either take into consideration sect. 118 at the time and express that in the order drawn up, or, if that is not done, should add that the order is made without prejudice to any question as to how the expense should be ultimately borne. If neither the one nor the other course is adopted, and the court is afterwards asked to exercise its jurisdiction under sect. 118, I think that a very clear and strong case ought to be made out.

HARROGATE CORPORATION v. DICKINSON. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Public health—Building by-laws—Deposit of plans—Change of by-laws after approval of plans—Row of houses—Part of work carried out—Right to complete according to approved plans—Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. clix.), s. 27.

Sect. 27 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 provided that the deposit with the corporation of any plan of any street or building should be null and void "if the execution of the work specified in such plan should not be commenced within three years from the date of such deposit."

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

[CT. OF APP.]

HARROGATE CORPORATION v. DICKINSON.

[CT. OF APP.]

In 1894 a builder deposited a plan showing thereon a number of houses which he proposed to erect, and which were in accordance with the building by-laws then in force in the borough. The plan was approved by the corporation.

Some of the houses were built and completed, and certificates were given on their completion by the corporation.

In Nov. 1901 the building by-laws in force in the borough were repealed "except as regards any work commenced before that date," and on the same day new by-laws came into force with which the plan that had been deposited by the builder in 1894 did not comply.

Held (affirming the decision of Wright, J. 88 L. T. Rep. 299), that the plan approved in 1894 was not merely the plan of one building, but was really a number of separate plans for the buildings shown thereon; that therefore the completion of some of the houses shown on the plan was not a commencement of the other buildings there shown, which were not in fact begun till after the new by-laws came into force, and the defendant was not entitled to go on with the work under the old by-laws.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J. upon a special case stated pursuant to Order XXXIV., r. 1.

The facts of the special case, which is set out in full in the report of the judgment of Wright, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 299), may be summarised as follows:—

The Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. cccix) provides:

Sect. 27. The deposit with the corporation of any plan of any street or building shall be null and void if the execution of the work specified in such plan be not commenced within the following periods (that is to say): As to plans deposited after the passing of this Act, within three years from the date of such deposit; and as to plans deposited before the passing of this Act, within three years from the passing of this Act; and at the expiration of those respective periods fresh notice and deposits shall, unless the corporation otherwise determine, be requisite.

On the 1st Oct. 1894 the defendant deposited with the plaintiffs two plans showing thereon eleven dwelling-houses and two stables and coach-houses proposed to be erected by him on a plot of land in Walker-road and Bilton-drive.

On the 8th Oct. 1894 these plans were approved by the plaintiffs.

Five of the dwelling-houses and one of the stables and coach-houses shown on the plans were completed by the defendant, and by June 1899 the plaintiffs had given to the defendant certificates that the buildings were completed and fit for human habitation.

On the 7th Nov. 1901 new building by-laws of the plaintiffs came into effect, clause 117 of which provided:

From and after the date of the confirmation of these by-laws, all by-laws relating to new streets and buildings, previously in force in the district, shall be repealed except as regards any work commenced before the date of the confirmation of this by-law or any work not so commenced but of which plans shall either have been approved by the council before such date, or have been sent to the surveyor to the council one month at least before such date and shall not have been disapproved by the council.

With these new by-laws the plans that had been deposited by the defendant did not comply, and under them, if applicable, the defendant would have been unable to complete the buildings shown on such plans.

On the 3rd Jan. 1902 the defendant began the building of the other stable and coach house shown on the plans which he had deposited in Oct. 1894.

On the 18th Jan. 1902 the plaintiffs' building inspector, by letter, requested the defendant to discontinue the works on the ground that the plans deposited in Oct. 1894 were null and void, pointing out that it would be advisable for the defendant to submit new plans to the plaintiffs for their approval.

The defendant thereupon discontinued the works.

Upon the special case that was stated for the opinion of the court, Wright, J. held that the two plans deposited were really a number of plans, and those particular portions on which work was not commenced were not within the words in clause 117 of the new by-laws, "any work commenced before the date of the confirmation of this by-law."

The learned judge therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Colefax for the defendant.—The question is whether the defendant is entitled to complete the houses according to the plans deposited and approved under the old by-laws, notwithstanding that the plans are not in accordance with the new by-laws. He is protected by the saving clause, No. 117, of the new by-laws. The plans which he deposited under sect. 27 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 is a plan of one building. "A building" is an expression of wider meaning than "a house." This row of houses was in effect one building, and therefore the work of erecting the building had in fact been begun before the new by-laws came into force. The question here really turns on the meaning of sect. 27, and therefore the case of White v. Corporation of Sunderland (88 L. T. Rep. 592) does not really affect the present case. The question in that case was as to the construction of the saving proviso of the repealing clause of some new by-laws. The clause was: "From and after the date of the confirmation of these by-laws, the following by-laws and parts of by-laws relating to new streets and buildings shall be repealed, except as regards any work commenced before the date of the confirmation of this by-law." The fair construction of that was except as regards any work of a "new building," and no part, not even a foundation or a party wall, of the houses proposed to be erected had been begun.

Danckwerts, K.C. and W. Mackenzie, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Danckwerts. I have very great doubt whether this is not a question of fact. I certainly see no grounds on which we should reverse the findings of the learned judge on the question of fact if that were so, but inasmuch as we have more power in these cases than we have in cases which come to the Divisional Court—magistrates' cases—I should like just to say how it strikes me. It is perfectly true that Mr. Colefax may for some purposes call the plan one plan, and I can well imagine cases arising where there might be cases of estoppel, or cases of a right to go on, founded on what had been done with regard to buildings shown on a plan. But in each particular case you must look at the facts of it. In the case now before us the plan showed three houses in a side street and seven houses in a front street, and two coach-houses detached from one another, with fence walls between, behind Nos. 1, 2, and 3 in the side street. The defendant built Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and got them certified; he also built Nos. 4 and 5 and one of the coach-houses, and then, for the purposes of this case, did nothing more until after the by-laws had come into force. Under those circumstances Wright, J. has held, having regard to the words in the by-law of the 7th Nov. 1901, that the "plan deposited" under sect. 27 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 was not a plan of one building which had been commenced, but was one plan of several buildings, and that therefore for the purposes of the by-law it was not protected, because sect. 27 of the Act of 1893 required that after three years there should be a fresh deposit. I think that it would be going too far to say that Wright, J. has come to a wrong conclusion; that for all time—which is the point which we have to consider in connection with the case of White v. Sunderland Corporation (ubi sup.)—a man has the right to go on, whatever might be the requirements of new by-laws, because he had begun to do part of the work or had built and completed some of the houses shown on the deposited plan. I think that all the grounds taken by Wright, J. are correct, and that the defendant was not entitled to go on under the old by-laws in consequence of what he had done in regard to the houses. I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

Re ARBITRATION BETWEEN GOUGH AND ASPATRIA, SILLOTH, AND DISTRICT JOINT WATER BOARD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Waterworks—Lands compulsorily taken for reservoir—Assessment of compensation—Natural and peculiar adaptability of land for building a reservoir—Right of arbitrator to take into consideration.

In assessing compensation for land compulsorily taken by a water company for the purpose of building a reservoir thereon, the natural and peculiar adaptability of the land for building a reservoir is a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

although there may be no evidence of any possible purchasers for that purpose besides the water company.

Judgment of Wright, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 421; (1903) 1 K. B. 574) affirmed.

APPEAL by the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Joint Water Board from the judgment of Wright, J. upon an award stated by an umpire in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

The award is set out at length in the report of the judgment of Wright, J. in 88 L. T. Rep. 421. The case is also reported (1903) 1 K. B. 574.

The facts were shortly as follows:—

By the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Water Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. lvii.), the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Joint Water Board was incorporated and constituted for the purposes of constructing the works and taking the waters authorised by the Act and supplying water within a certain district.

On the 14th Oct. 1901 the water board served a notice to treat upon the claimant as owner in fee simple of some lands proposed to be taken by the board.

The parties failed to agree as to the amount of the purchase money and compensation to be paid.

Arbitrators were appointed by the parties, and an umpire by the Board of Trade, and, as the arbitrators differed, the matter was referred to the umpire.

In the course of the arbitration the parties came to an agreement as to certain works which the board wished to carry out; and it was arranged that, instead of acquiring the fee simple of a certain piece of land on which was the Overwater Lake, the water board should acquire a perpetual easement for the construction and maintenance of a bank 440 yards in length and the right to cover the land with water or denude it of water, subject to certain conditions, so that the Overwater Lake should be comprised in what was called the Overwater Reservoir.

On another part of the land taken for the claimant a reservoir called the Chapel House Reservoir was to be constructed.

The umpire found that the lands over which such easement was to be acquired were, "owing to the natural configuration thereof, peculiarly adaptable in conjunction with Overwater Lake for the construction of a reservoir." He also found that, owing to the natural configuration of the lands which were the intended site of the Chapel House Reservoir, such lands were peculiarly adaptable for the construction of a reservoir.

The main question for the opinion of the court was whether, in estimating the value of the land and easements to be acquired by the water board for the Overwater and Chapel House Reservoirs respectively, the natural and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the lands in question is or is not a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof in the assessment of compensation.

If the court should be of opinion that in estimating the value of the land and easements to be acquired for the Overwater and Chapel House Reservoirs the natural and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the lands in question is not a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof in the assessment of compensation, then the sum awarded by the umpire was to be reduced by the sum of 1636l.

Wright, J. held that the natural value of the site for the purposes of water supply was a matter which ought to be taken into consideration in the assessment of compensation.

The water board appealed.

Balfour Browne, K.C. and Roskill, K.C. for the water board—The umpire has found nothing with regard to the value of the land except that, from the physical configuration of the land, it is peculiarly suitable for the building of a reservoir. That is not a ground on which compensation can be assessed. The value of the land to the water board is immaterial. There is no evidence that the suitability of the land for a reservoir increased its value as regards anyone besides the water board:

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Waterworks—Land compulsorily taken for reservoir—Assessment of compensation—Special natural adaptability of land for building a reservoir.

APPEAL from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Mellor and Manisty, JJ.) upon a case stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the court.

J. G. Riddell was tenant for life of certain lands authorised to be taken by the Newcastle and Gateshead Water Company for the purpose of making three reservoirs and other works.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. lxxxvii.) provided as follows:—“Sect. 9. For the further protection of the said J. G. Riddell, his heirs, assigns in estate, and assigns, all of whom are included under his name when used in this section, the following provisions shall have effect and be binding on the company. . . . (2) The company shall during every day of twenty-four hours in every year deliver into the said stream called Dryburn, below the ‘Little Swinburn Reservoir,’ a quantity of water being not less than 200,000 gallons. . . . (7) The said quantity of water shall, subject to the provisions of the agreement of 1876, and the agreement scheduled to and confirmed by this Act, be accepted and taken as full compensation for all water which the company can collect or divert and impound by the works authorised by the Act of 1876 as varied by this Act.”

The arbitrator, Mr. Clutton, in addition to a sum of 17,600l. which he determined as the amount of the purchase money, and compensation for damage, to be paid by the company to J. G. Riddell, awarded a further sum of 5000l. in respect of a claim by Mr. Riddell in regard to water which the company could divert and impound by means of their works, provided that the court should be of opinion that sect. 9, sub-sect. 7, of the Companies Act of 1877 was not a bar to that claim.

The Queen's Bench Division (Mellor and Manisty, JJ.) held that the award of the arbitrator was right, the Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The point argued here is one of very great importance, but, so far as this court is concerned, I think that the law is proper compensation to be paid to the claimant being the sum of 17,600l. only.

Upon the claimant's appeal from this decision, the Court of Appeal delivered the following judgments:—

BRAMWELL, L.J.—Really, speaking sincerely, the only distrust I feel about this case is that I cannot get myself to entertain a doubt about it, but there are some points in it upon which I cannot say the award, to my mind, is perfectly clear and intelligible. The arbitrator says, “I award, settle, and determine that the amount of the purchase money and compensation to be paid by the said company for and in respect of the absolute purchase of the lands, tenements, right, easements, and premises so required to be purchased”; and one may observe that that certainly includes waters, because there is a reference to the 1st schedule in his award, and the 1st schedule says that the parcels are “all that piece of land,” and so forth, together with all waters, ways, paths, passages, &c.; and he says, “I award the purchase money for that.” Then he goes on, to my mind, most clearly, to say a claim has been made in respect of the damage that can be done to Mr. Riddell's estate and his successors by the powers of the company—that means as to his other lands, not to his lands to be taken and paid for, because it does not matter to him what damage is done to them—but for the damage in respect of the remaining lands by the powers of the company to divert and alter the natural course of the water. He says as to that: “It has been objected that it has been bargained away. If it has not, I give 5000l.; if it has, I do not give it.” That is the award, to my mind; and, as I understand, Mr. Webster says that if that is the award on the face of it, if that is what the award means, he cannot object. He says: “I contend that the meaning of the award is this: I give so much money for compensation, and I would give 5000l. more for compensation if I could, but the company says that Mr. Riddell's rights have been taken away, and the 5000l. more in respect of which I am asked to give compensation is this, that the land has a special value in respect of its fitness for a reservoir, and I would give 5000l. for that, if it were not that that is bargained away by the section.” Now, I am very clearly of opinion that, if he did act upon that notion, he acted upon an erroneous notion, because the land had a peculiar value on account of its fitness for a reservoir, or for building land, or for a skating rink, or for tea gardens, or what not. Those were all things the value of which must have been taken into consideration, and, when one knows that the arbitrator was Mr. Clutton, it is, to my mind, impossible to suppose that he would not have taken that into account. It certainly would be a most remarkable thing that he should have made a double mistake of not taking into account that which he ought to have taken into account and stated his award in such a way that the first mistake he made was concealed in the other. In my opinion the judgment of the court below was perfectly right, and I cannot think that any injustice has been done to Mr. Riddell in the matter. Of course, with respect to Mr. Webster's last application, if there was any obscurity on the face of the award we might send it back to have it cleared up; but, to my mind, there is absolutely none. I think before we send an award back we ought to have strong reasons given; and, if Mr. Clutton had come forward and made an affidavit that he had made the double mistake, there might be reason to entertain the application; but I am satisfied that the award was right (it is a question of what the arbitrator ought to say), and that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—It seems to me that the award is clear. In the first part of the award the arbitrator gives compensation in respect of the absolute purchase of the settled. If it is to be altered, it must be in the House of Lords. The umpire has found that the natural configuration of the land is peculiarly lands and compensation for the damage that may be sustained by reason of the execution of the works. It seems to me clear that that would give the value of the land, taking into account its position and all its capabilities for any particular purpose. Then upon the face of the award it seems to me that somebody suggested that, besides that ordinary value—the land valued in the ordinary way with all its capabilities—Mr. Riddell was entitled to something more, not as adding value to the land, but that he was entitled to compensation for water as water which the company could collect or divert and impound, that means which the company could now collect or divert and impound, and which, if the company had not so done, he could have collected or diverted and impounded, and that he claims in addition to the land with all its capabilities. I think the answer of my brother Manisty is perfect, which is: "If you claim for water in that way, in addition to the value of the land, as water which the company could collect or divert and impound, you are claiming that for which by the Act of Parliament in terms you are already paid, for that says that the 200,000 gallons of water per day is to be compensation for all water which the company can collect or divert and impound"—the very thing which was claimed from the arbitrator in addition to the value of the land. I can see no answer to that judgment of my brother Manisty, and I think, therefore, that this appeal is wrong.

COTTON, L.J.—The question which we have to consider is whether the landowner is entitled to a sum of 5000*l.* in addition to the 17,600*l.* which has been given him by the award. Now, he was held by the court below not entitled to the 5000*l.*, and the arbitrator doubted about it in consequence of sect. 9, sub-sect 7, of the Act of 1877. As I understand that clause (I need not read it), it in no way deprives him of any right which he would have to enhance the purchase money to be given to him for land in consequence of any of the capabilities or circumstances which enhance the value of that land as land, but in my own opinion it did deprive him of any claim for compensation in consequence of damage alleged to be done by the execution of the works of the water company to the remainder of his estate by diverting or depriving him of water which otherwise the estate would have had the benefit of; and what we have to consider on the face of the award is whether or not the award shows that this 5000*l.* was a sum which would have been given by the arbitrator unless he had found himself bound to exclude, in estimating the value of the land, one of those circumstances which under ordinary circumstances but for the Act of Parliament he would have taken into consideration in estimating the value of the land so taken, or whether he has treated that 5000*l.* as a sum which was claimed in respect of damage to the estate in consequence of the execution of the works of the company and by the diversion of water from the estate. We must look only to the award and to the face of the award. We cannot regard anything which passed, even if there was anything which passed, before the arbitrator which might lead to a different conclusion from that which appears on the face of the award. Now, looking at the face of the award, I cannot possibly come to the conclusion that the arbitrator has not taken into consideration, in estimating the sum of 17,600*l.*, all the capabilities of the land, including any value arising from the fact of its being well-watered land or land available for the purpose of making a reservoir or anything else connected with traffic in water, and I also must come to the conclusion on the face of the award that the 5000*l.* was the sum which he rejected as being a sum paid for damage to the estate in consequence of the diversion of the water adaptable for the construction of a reservoir, and has for that reason awarded £1636*l.* beyond what has been called the ordinary normal value of the

by the execution of the works of the company. Now, if you look at it, you will find a recital in the reference to him that he is to estimate what sum of money should be paid, not only for the absolute purchase of the lands and tenements, rights, easements, and premises so required to be purchased and taken, but also by way of compensation for any damage which might be sustained by reason of the execution of the works for which the said lands, rights, and premises were so required. Now, that of necessity must be damage to the remainder of the estate, because there could be no damage to the land taken by reason of the execution of the works; that would be the property of the company when the works were executed, and damage, therefore, necessarily must be the damage to the remainder of the estate and to the owners of the estate. Then we come to the award, and in the award the arbitrator gives the sum of 17,600*l.* in respect of the absolute purchase of the lands, tenements, rights, easements, and premises so required to be purchased and as compensation for the damage which may be sustained by reason of the execution of the works, subject to this, that, as part of the compensation for damage which the said John Giffard Riddell and his successors in estate would sustain by reason of the execution of the works for which the said lands, rights, and premises are required, he claims a large sum for water which the company could collect or divert and impound by the said works, and he doubts whether that is not concluded by the section of the Act of Parliament. By the very terms of his award he deals in one part of it with the value of the land, and as far as the award shows, and as we must conclude, has taken into consideration all the elements of value. He also deals with the claim made for damage in consequence of the execution of the works, all included in 17,600*l.*, with the exception of a certain particular claim made in respect of damage which would be sustained by the execution of the works. In my opinion, therefore, that award shows on the face of it that the claim in respect of the 5000*l.* which was not estimated by him was not a claim in respect of an element of value in the land, but a claim in respect of damage which it was said would be suffered by the estate in consequence of the execution of the works, and in consequence of the company diverting certain water. That claim was concluded, in my opinion, by the section of the Act of Parliament, although an element of value in the land not in any way to be taken into consideration by him. It was, however, said that he had excluded any water element value by the terms under which he mentioned what it was in respect of the purchase of which he gave the 17,600*l.* It was said that it was referred to him to estimate the value of the land, water, and premises, and various other things mentioned in the schedule, and that here he had omitted water; but in the award he is merely following the words of description which are to be found in the recital of the reference to him, because (and I have read it) it was referred to him to settle and determine what sum should be paid for the absolute purchase of lands, tenements, rights, easements, and premises, and these are the exact words which he uses in that part of the award which fixes the sum of 17,600*l.* as the compensation to be paid for those things. He does not give water in the awarding part any more than he gives it in the recital; but there being a long list of general words in the 1st schedule to the award which includes not only water, but hedges and fences and various other things in the award—both in the recital and in the awarding part—and there is a short description of the same in both cases, and the reference to him was clearly to ascertain the value of all that there was in the schedule. The description in the first place and in the latter must be taken to include water, and that is the only descrip-land. It is contended that he has acted wrongly; that he ought not to have given compensation based on the purpose to which the land is to be put by the water board, there being no evidence that any other purchaser would have paid that additional value. I think that the point is decided in Re Riddell and Newcastle and Gateshead Water Company (ubi sup.), and probably also in Re Ossalinsky and Manchester Corporation (ubi sup.). I should like to say exactly how the point arose in Re Riddell and Newcastle and Gateshead Water Company, in which I appeared as counsel. In the present case Wright, J. has held that the claimant could not sell the water, and therefore has no claim for compensation in that respect. That point was not argued in the Queen's Bench in Re Riddell and Newcastle and Gateshead Water Company, and therefore in getting to the Court of Appeal we were in a little difficulty. I thought at the time that there was ground for arguing that on the face of the award the arbitrator had included as an element of value the natural adaptability of the site, and I contended that that would not be taking the value of the land as it was in the hands of the vendor. But Bramwell, L.J. clearly thought that the adaptability of the site was an element which enhanced the value of the land in the hands of the vendor. He said that the arbitrator had awarded the 17,600*l.* as compensation in respect of the lands, tenements, rights, easements, and premises required to be purchased, and the sum of 5000*l.*, if he had power to give it, as compensation for damage done to the claimant's remaining land by the power of the company to alter the natural course of the water. And he then said that the land had a peculiar value on account of its fitness for a reservoir, or for building land, or for a skating rink, or for tea gardens, or what not, all things the value of which must be taken into consideration; and, knowing that Mr. Clutton was the arbitrator, it was impossible to suppose that he had not taken them into account. Brett and Cotton, L.J.J. gave judgment to exactly the same effect—viz., that it was a mistake to omit to consider any additional value to the land in consequence of the suitability of the site. It may be of interest to those who have followed this branch of the law that, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal, I consulted Theisiger, L.J., who was a master of the law of compensation, and he told me that the judgment of the Court of Appeal had only followed the recognised practice of surveyors for many years. So deep was the impression made upon me by that case that I consulted other gentlemen of experience in this matter, who said that the rule laid down by the Court of Appeal was not a new one. For this reason I have always regretted that Re Riddell and Newcastle and Gateshead Water Company has not been reported, because I think that it really recognised that rule. Re Ossalinsky and Manchester Corporation is another example of the same rule. But, as I pointed out in the tion there is to be found in the words of the schedule. In my opinion this claim on the award must be taken as a claim for damage—consequential damage—covered by the clause in the Act of Parliament as not being a sum in respect of an element of value which the arbitrator thought he was bound to exclude by that Act of Parliament.

course of the argument, no question of law is really involved. If no possible purchaser is to be found, that shows that the element of value is not worth very much. I think, therefore, that Wright, J. has not added to what was found by the umpire, but has decided in accordance with the principle laid down in the cases cited, when he said: "If there is a site which has peculiar natural advantages for the supply of water to a particular valley or a particular area, or to all valleys or areas within a certain distance, if those valleys are what might be called natural customers for water by reason of their populousness and of their situation—if the site has peculiar natural advantages for supplying in that sense—apart from any value created or enhanced by any Act of Parliament or scheme for appropriating the water to a particular local authority, then I think it ought to be taken that there is a natural value in the site for the purposes of water supply, and that it should be taken into consideration." For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion. The question is really one of fact. It is said on behalf of the appellants that it follows as a matter of law from the facts as found by the umpire that the element of value arising from the peculiar adaptability of the site for a reservoir ought not to be included. In holding that it ought to be included, the umpire has accepted a prima facie presumption that the element of value existed and should be paid for—a presumption based upon a long series of authorities, and one in accordance with good sense. Underlying all that is the presumption that there is a reasonable possibility of a market for the land. The whole question of value has relation to the existence of a possible market, and anyone who wishes to exclude an element of value which should prima facie be taken into account should show that there is no reasonable probability of the land coming into the market. I agree that the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

SHARMAN v. HOLLIDAY AND GREENWOOD LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Weekly payment—Application to review—Change of circumstances—Res judicata—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), sched. 1, clause 12.

The employer of a workman receiving weekly payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1897 applied for a review of the weekly payment, under clause 12 of the 1st schedule to the Act, upon the ground that the workman was no longer incapacitated for work.

The County Court judge, acting upon the evidence of medical experts that the workman was not incapacitated for work, reduced the weekly payment to the nominal sum of 1d.

Subsequently the workman applied for a review of the weekly payment upon the ground that since the previous hearing he had repeatedly been refused, and had been unable to obtain, work owing to incapacity arising from his physical condition caused by the accident.

The County Court judge refused to entertain the application, upon the ground that the matter was res judicata, and that no change of circumstances since the previous hearing was alleged which would give him jurisdiction to review the weekly payment.

Held (allowing the appeal), that the matter was not res judicata, and that sufficient change of circumstances was alleged to give the judge jurisdiction to entertain the application.

Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (82 L. T. Rep. 813; (1900) 2 Q. B. 629) distinguished.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the award of the County Court judge at Lambeth upon an application to review the weekly payment under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants in an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applied. His leg was broken, and he was for a time totally incapacitated for work.

A memorandum of agreement was filed in the County Court by which the defendants agreed to make a weekly payment to the plaintiff during incapacity for work.

On the 21st Jan. 1903 an application by the defendants to review the weekly payment, upon the ground that the plaintiff was no longer incapacitated for work, was heard by the County Court judge.

At the hearing of this application the evidence of expert medical witnesses on both sides was given upon the question whether the plaintiff was or was not in fact injured so as to be incapacitated for work.

The County Court judge found that the plaintiff was not incapacitated for work, and he reduced the amount of the award to the nominal sum of 1d. per week. He said: "This is a difficult case, but I think I am bound to come to the conclusion on the weight of the medical evidence that I will reduce the amount to the nominal sum of 1d. per week. Mr. Thompson [counsel for the plaintiff], the door is still open to you to come again. It is a very serious case indeed, and affects the whole foundation of the Workmen's Compensation Act, if it is a fraud. It is one thing or the other."

On the 23rd June 1903 the plaintiff applied for a review of the weekly payment. The County Court judge asked the counsel for the plaintiff what were the new facts arising out of the accident showing that the plaintiff's earning powers had been diminished since the hearing of the application to review on the 21st Jan. 1903.

Counsel for the plaintiff stated that the new facts upon which he relied, and which he was prepared to prove, were as follows: (1) That the plaintiff had been refused employment repeatedly, even by his former master, on account of the condition of his foot. (2) That the County Court judge did not decide the application at the hearing on the 21st Jan. solely on the medical evidence, but partly on his personal observation of the plaintiff's movements, and that the highest expert evidence on new observations and tests of the condition of the plaintiff was tendered to show that the plaintiff was unfit to follow his usual employment. (3) That the County Court judge kept the arbitration alive by awarding 1d. weekly, in view of the possibility of a change in the circumstances, and that, the arbitration being so kept alive, it could not be res judicata. (4) The plaintiff did not seek for a fresh award, but for a review of the weekly payments.

The County Court judge gave his decision as follows: "As I decided on the 21st Jan. that the earning powers were not at that time diminished, and as the present application is again on the ground of total incapacity, I hold that the matter is res judicata, and also that there are no facts alleged showing any alteration in the circumstances of the case since the hearing on the 21st Jan."

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides:

First schedule. Clause 12. Any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum above provided, and the amount of payment shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act.

The plaintiff appealed.

R. M. Bray, K.C. and W. M. Thompson for the appellant.—The learned County Court judge was wrong in holding that the matter was res judicata and that there were no new facts alleged showing any change of circumstances since the former hearing. At the former hearing it is clear that the judge did not intend to treat his decision then as final and conclusive, but that it should be open for the workman to apply to him again if it should turn out that he was really incapacitated for work. The fact that it has been shown by subsequent experiment that the workman is unable to get employment because he is incapacitated for work is a sufficient change of circumstances to entitle him to apply for a review of the weekly payment, under clause 12 of the 1st schedule. Upon that ground this case is clearly distinguishable from Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (82 L. T. Rep. 813; (1900) 2 Q. B. 629), in which the employers sought to show on a subsequent application that the average weekly earnings of the workman had been incorrectly stated at the first hearing when the weekly payment was awarded.

Shakspeare for the respondents.—The decision of the County Court judge was correct. An application for a review of the weekly payment cannot be made under clause 12 of the 1st schedule unless there has been a change in the circumstances of the case since the weekly payment was awarded:

Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (sup.).

The change must be in the condition of the workman, affecting his capacity for work. In this case there is no suggestion of any evidence to show that there has been any change in the condition of the workman between the time when the award was made and the date of this application for review of the weekly payment. At the original hearing the question was whether the workman was totally incapacitated for work; the judge decided that he was not, and that question is res judicata. The plaintiff is really now seeking to show that he was then and is now totally incapacitated, and that the original decision was therefore wrong. The suggestion that subsequent experiment has shown that in fact the previous decision was wrong does not show that there was any change of circumstances to justify a review.

R. M. Bray, K.C., was not called upon to reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the County Court judge who gave his decision upon an application under clause 12 of the 1st schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Upon an application by the employers under clause 12, the County Court judge made an award for the payment of the nominal sum of 1d. a week, and thereby kept seisin of the matter. Upon a later occasion, on an application by the workman to review the amount of the weekly payment, the County Court judge held, upon the authority of Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (82 L. T. Rep. 813; (1900) 2 Q. B. 629), that he could not entertain the application, because the matter was res judicata, and also because there were no fresh facts or circumstances in the case. The question now really is whether, in the circumstances of this case, the decision of the judge upon the first application is to govern the position of the parties for all time. In the first place, I very much doubt whether it can be said that there was any estoppel by the decision of the judge as to the capacity of the workman for work, which was merely a matter of opinion. That may often be a question which can only be really decided by experiment, and in that case the decision of the judge founded upon the evidence of experts may be quite displaced by subsequent experiment. The opinion of experts might be that a workman was capable of doing work, and yet the man might afterwards try to do that work and find that it was quite impossible. It is said that such a decision upon the evidence of experts is res judicata and must be an estoppel for all time. I cannot think that the doctrine of estoppel applies to such a case. It is said that the case of Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (ubi sup.) is an authority to that effect, but I do not think that it is. What was decided in that case was not a matter of opinion or of expert evidence. In that case the award of the weekly payment was made upon the basis that the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident were 30s. a week, as stated by him in his particulars, the employers not having taken the steps necessary to entitle them to dispute that statement, and being therefore precluded from proving that his average earnings were really much less. There was no appeal, but the employers subsequently applied for a review of the weekly payment, really upon the ground that the average weekly earnings were much less than had been stated at the first hearing. It was decided that the employers were estopped from denying that the average weekly earnings were not as proved by the workman at the first hearing; and that, as there had been no change in the circumstances of the case since the weekly payment was awarded, the application could not be entertained. That was not the case of an application to review the weekly payment upon the ground that subsequent experience showed that a decision founded upon the evidence of experts was wrong. Here the application appears to be made upon the ground that evidence can now be given to show that it has been proved by the test of subsequent experiment that the workman is in fact incapacitated for work. I am not prepared to say that in this case there is not such a change of circumstances as to justify an application for a review of the weekly payment by the County Court judge. I do not think that the decision in Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (ubi sup.) is any authority for saying that in a case like this, where the opinion of the County Court judge founded upon the evidence of experts is shown by subsequent experiment to be wrong, there cannot be an application to review the weekly payments because the workman's condition is really the same as it was at the time of the first hearing. If that were so, I think that great injustice might be done. There is nothing to be found in the Act to that effect. It seems to me that, within the principle of the decision in Crossfield and Sons v. Tanian (ubi sup.), when examined, there is such a change of circumstances alleged here as to justify an application for review, subsequent experiment having shown that in fact the previous opinion was wrong. When fairly considered, I think that the written notes of the grounds for review, put forward by the plaintiff's counsel, do suggest evidence of new facts and evidence of new circumstances which could be given, particularly the evidence that the plaintiff had been repeatedly refused work on account of his incapacity, which would justify a review of the weekly payment under clause 12 of the 1st schedule to the Act. I think, therefore, that this case must go back to the County Court judge to hear the application, and to hear the evidence on behalf of the workman. This appeal must therefore be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The doctrine of res judicata is reasonable when there has been a formal inquiry and an issue distinctly raised as to facts in an action or other legal proceeding. It would, however, I think be unreasonable to apply that rule to an inquiry of this kind as to a workman's state of health, which proceeded upon the evidence of experts when the actual facts could not be ascertained. It is not the same as the case in which a disputed fact has, upon conflicting evidence, been determined after a trial. The effect of the argument on behalf of the employers is that, although fresh symptoms may appear after the first hearing, the condition of the workman still remains the same as it was, and there can be no review. I am clearly of opinion that there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which precludes a further inquiry when, after the first hearing, fresh symptoms of incapacity for work have shown themselves. Expert witnesses may say that in their opinion, upon the symptoms then appearing, the workman is not in a condition which incapacitates him for work, and the County Court judge may so decide. That question may, however, be solved by subsequent experiment, and the workman may make the experiment by trying to get work and to work, with the result that he is shown to be in fact incapacitated for work. It would, in my opinion, be most unfair if, in a case of that kind, the doctrine of estoppel were applied to prevent a workman from applying for a review. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to have the inquiry for which he has applied to the County Court judge. Further, at the original hearing the County Court judge did not treat the matter in such a way as to show that he intended that the question should be res judicata. The County Court judge then said: "This is a difficult case, but I think that I am bound to come to the conclusion on the weight of the medical evidence that I will reduce the amount to the nominal sum of one penny per week. Mr. Thompson, the door is still open to you to come again." I think, therefore, that it is quite plain that this case must go back to the County Court judge to hear the application of the workman.

NEAGLE v. NIXON'S NAVIGATION COMPANY.
EDWARDS v. GUEST, KEEN, AND NETTLEFOLDS;
HIATT v. SAME. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Workman in receipt of weekly payments—Medical examination of workman—Examination by employer's doctor—Refusal by workman of further examination by medical referee—Suspension of weekly payments—Right of workman to arbitration—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), sched. 1, clause 11.

A workman in receipt of weekly payments by way of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, who has at the request of the employer, under clause 11 of the 1st schedule to the Act, submitted to examination by the employer's doctor, cannot be required by the employer to submit to a further examination by a medical referee appointed under the Act, and he may, if the employer suspends the weekly payments, proceed to arbitration under the Act.

APPEALS of the plaintiff in the first case from the order of the County Court judge at Merthyr Tydfil, and of the defendants in the other two cases from orders of the County Court judge at Pontypool, in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff Neagle was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants.

Neagle duly gave notice of this injury to the defendants, and for some time they made weekly payments to him by way of compensation.

The defendants subsequently required him to submit himself for examination by a medical practitioner appointed by them, under clause 11 of the 1st schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides, by the 1st schedule:

(11) Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer, or by any person by whom the employer is entitled under this Act to be indemnified, from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer, or such other person; but, if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act, as mentioned in the second schedule to this Act, and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman at the time of the examination shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive evidence of that condition. If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place.

Neagle did submit himself for examination by the medical practitioner provided by the defendants, who pronounced him to be recovered and fit for work, and made a certificate to that effect.

The defendants communicated to Neagle the effect of the certificate, and gave him notice that, if he was dissatisfied with the certificate, he might submit himself for examination by one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of the Act, and that, if he did not do so, the weekly payments would be suspended.

Neagle did not submit himself for examination by such a medical referee, and the defendants discontinued the weekly payments.

Neagle then commenced proceedings to recover compensation under the Act by filing a request for arbitration.

The defendants then applied for a stay of proceedings in the arbitration until he had been examined by a medical referee, under rule 50 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules.

The Workmen's Compensation Rules provide:

Rule 50 (1). In any case in which an arbitration is pending, or an award has been made or a memorandum recorded or a certificate given, and the employer or any person by whom the employer is entitled to be indemnified alleges that the workman who claims or has been awarded compensation refuses to submit himself for examination in accordance with par. 3 or par. 11 of the first schedule to the Act, or obstructs such examination, such employer or other person may apply to the judge or arbitrator to stay proceedings in the arbitration, or to suspend the weekly payments awarded until such examination has taken place.

The County Court judge decided in favour of the defendants, and made an order staying the proceedings in the arbitration.

The plaintiff Neagle appealed.

In the other two cases, which were heard before a different County Court judge, the facts were similar to those in the first case, but the judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and refused to stay the proceedings.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants in these two cases appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., Rhys Williams, and J. Sankey for the plaintiff in the first case.—The decision of the County Court judge was wrong. The proper construction of clause 11 of the 1st schedule to the Act is that the workman must, at the request of the employer, submit to be examined by the employer's medical practitioner, with an option of being examined instead by a medical referee appointed under the Act if he objects to the employer's medical practitioner, and with the further option of appealing from the certificate of the employer's medical practitioner to a medical referee. The words at the end of clause 11, "if the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination," there clearly refer to a refusal to be examined either by the employer's doctor, or by a medical referee. The examination by a medical referee is purely optional on the part of the workman; the only examination to which the employer can require the workman to submit is an examination by the employer's doctor; and, therefore, that is the only examination to which the workman can "refuse" to submit. The certificate of the employer's doctor is not made conclusive in any way; it is not even made evidence. If the contention of the employers is correct, the result would be that, when the employer has required the workman to be examined by the employer's doctor, the workman will be deprived of his right to arbitration, because he must then be examined by a medical referee, whose certificate is conclusive. The suspension of the weekly payments is only to take effect if the workman refuses to submit to any examination at all. In this case the workman did submit to examination by the employer's doctor, and therefore rule 50 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules does not apply. This question has been decided in two recent cases in Scotland. In Davidson v. Summerlee and Moss End Iron and Steel Company (5 Fraser, 991) the point was decided in favour of the employer, one of the judges (Lord Young) dissenting; but in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company v. McKay (40 Sc. L. Rep. 798) it was decided in favour of the workman. The reasoning of the dissenting judge in the former case, and of the judgments in the latter case, appears to be unanswerable and conclusive.

Asquith, K.C. and J. Sankey for the plaintiffs in the other cases, supported the above argument.

Haldane, K.C., Ruegg, K.C., and Anton Parsons for the defendants in all the cases.—The decision of the County Court judge in the first case was right. The question is simply one of construction of clause 11 in the 1st schedule. The Act provides, by clause 12 of the 1st schedule, that any weekly payment may, on review, be ended, diminished, or increased. The provisions of clause 11 are intended to enable the employer to obtain information for the purpose of having the weekly payments ended or diminished. If he requires the workman to be examined by his doctor and the workman refuses, the payments will be suspended; if the workman chooses to be examined by a medical referee his certificate is conclusive; equally if the workman refuses to be bound by the certificate of the employer's doctor the employer must have an option to require the workman to be examined by a medical referee. The meaning of the words at the end of clause 11, "if the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination," is that if the workman refuses any examination, or refuses on request of the employer to be examined by a medical referee, the weekly payments shall be suspended. If the workman chooses to take his case before a medical referee the certificate is conclusive on the employer. It would be strange if it were entirely at the option of the workman to get or not to get a certificate conclusive on the employer. The intention of the Act is that this question with regard to the condition of the workman from time to time might be settled speedily and cheaply by a medical referee instead of by arbitration proceedings.

Collins, M.R.—It seems to me that this point lies within a very short compass. The case arises thus: A workman was injured while in the employment of the defendants, and by agreement compensation was paid to him by the defendants for some time after the accident. Then the employers, thinking that the workman had recovered, required him to submit himself for examination by their medical practitioner. The workman did submit to such an examination, and was pronounced to be fit for work. The employers thereupon gave him notice that they would not pay compensation any longer. The workman then took these proceedings to recover compensation under the Act, and the employers applied to the judge, under rule 50 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules and clause 11 of the 1st schedule of the Act, to stay proceedings in the arbitration until the workman had been examined by a medical referee appointed under the Act. The question is whether, having regard to the terms of clause 11, it is a condition precedent to the right of the workman to have compensation assessed under the Act that he shall submit himself for examination by a medical referee appointed under the Act. That question turns upon the proper construction of clause 11. Perhaps it is desirable to refer first to the provisions of clause 3 of the 1st schedule, which provides that where a workman has given notice of an accident he shall, if so required by the employer, submit himself for examination by a medical man provided and paid by the employer, and that, if he refuses to submit to such examination, his right to compensation and any proceeding under this Act in relation to compensation shall be suspended until such examination takes place. Then we come to clause 11, the clause now in question, which provides that "Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer . . . from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer." That clause presupposes that the workman is in receipt of a weekly payment either by agreement or under an award, and so far it imposes a compulsory obligation upon the workman, subject to certain consequences in case of refusal, to submit to examination by a medical man appointed by the employer. Then follow certain qualifications upon that compulsory obligation in these terms: "But if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by

BEAUMONT v. KAYE AND ANOTHER.

the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act," whose certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the condition of the workman. Then the clause provides that "if the workman refuses to submit to such examination . . . his right to such weekly payment shall be suspended until such examination has taken place." It was contended on behalf of the employers that "such examination" means the examination by the medical referee appointed under the Act, and that, therefore, if the workman refuses to submit to that examination his right to receive compensation is suspended until that examination takes place. The County Court judge accepted that view of clause 11 and acted upon it. In my opinion, when the whole clause is read together, it appears clearly that that is not the right view. The sanction at the end of the clause is addressed to a person who has refused to do something which some other person has a right to require him to do. The only examination which the employer has a right to insist upon is an examination by a medical man provided and paid by him; that is the only compulsion imposed upon the workman, subject to this qualification, that the workman may substitute something else if he dislikes that medical practitioner or is dissatisfied with his decision, in which case he may submit to examination by a medical referee, and, if he does so, the certificate of the medical referee as to the workman's condition is binding upon both parties. If he chooses to do so, the workman takes that risk, but that is not compulsory upon him in any way. In this case the workman has submitted to the only thing to which he was bound to submit, and he has not taken the other choice. To hold that "such" examination means examination by a medical referee because the word "such" must refer to the last antecedent, would, it seems to me, be to substitute a highly technical interpretation of the clause for that which is its plain and obvious meaning. It is not necessary in all cases to take the last antecedent. In this clause, taking it as a whole, it is obvious that the examination to which the last part of the clause refers is that examination to which the workman is bound to submit. Many other clauses and rules have been referred to in argument, but I think that it is not necessary to go through them. This point has, in my opinion, been conclusively and satisfactorily dealt with by Lord Young, in Davidson v. Summerlee and Moss End Iron and Steel Company (5 Fraser, 991), and by all the judges in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company v. McKay (40 Sc. L. Rep. 798), and I think that it is not necessary for me now to say more than that I entirely agree with those judgments. This appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the appeals in the other two cases must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case for the employers has been argued with great ingenuity in the face of the judgments in the Scotch cases which have been cited. It seems to me to be only necessary to read through clause 11 of the 1st schedule to see what it means. It is contended on behalf of the employers that it is a condition precedent to the right of the workman to receive compensation that he shall submit himself for examination by "one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act," and that when he has done so the certificate of that medical practitioner is conclusive and the workman cannot go into court. Where is that to be found in the Act? Clause 11 of the 1st schedule provides, in the first part, that the workman shall, if so required, submit to examination by the medical practitioner provided by the employer, and then provides at the end that if he refuses to submit to such examination the weekly payments shall be suspended. It is contended for the employers that the second part of the clause is compulsory, but it seems to me to be clearly optional on the part of the workman to be examined by a medical referee. The words at the end of the clause are: "If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination." It seems to me to be clear that that refers to the examination by the medical practitioner provided by the employer to which the clause requires the workman to submit. I agree with the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, and that the appeal of the workman must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree, and will add only a few words. A workman cannot be said to refuse to submit to an examination which is optional on his part. Upon the fair construction of clause 11 I think that the employer cannot require a workman, who has been examined by the employer's doctor, to submit to a further examination by the medical referee. The words "such examination" prima facie mean one examination only, and that is the examination by the employer's doctor to which the workman is required to submit.

BEAUMONT v. KAYE AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Husband and wife—Tort of wife—Action against husband and wife—Defence—Different defences by husband and wife—Practice—Married Women's Property Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (2)—Order XXII., r. 1.

In an action to recover damages from a husband and wife for a libel alleged to have been published by the wife, if the husband pleads a payment into court in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, the wife cannot plead a defence denying liability.

APPEAL of the defendants from an order of Bucknill, J. at chambers directing part of the defence to be struck out.

BEAUMONT v. KAYE AND ANOTHER.

[CT. OF APP.]

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants, who were husband and wife, damages for a libel alleged to have been written and published by the wife.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleged that the male defendant was the husband of the female defendant; and that the female defendant had written and published a letter which was defamatory of the plaintiff; and he claimed damages from both defendants generally.

One defence was delivered by the defendants; the husband pleaded that, so far as he was liable as the husband of the other defendant, he paid the sum of 5*l.* into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim; and the wife denied that she had published the alleged defamatory letter.

The Married Women's Property Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75) provides:

Sect. 1 (2). A married woman shall be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property on any contract and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her; and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action or other proceeding shall be her separate property; and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property and not otherwise.

The Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XXII., provide:

Rule 1. Where any action is brought to recover a debt or damages, or in an Admiralty action, any defendant may, before or at the time of delivering his defence, or at any later time by leave of the court or a judge, pay into court a sum of money by way of satisfaction, which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made; or he may, with a defence denying liability (except in actions or counter-claims for libel or slander), pay money into court which shall be subject to the provisions of rule 6.

The plaintiff applied for an order striking out all the paragraphs of the defence except that in which the husband pleaded the payment into court.

The district registrar refused to make an order, but, on appeal, an order was made by Bucknill, J. at chambers striking out all the defence except the plea of payment into court.

The defendants appealed.

T. P. Perks for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in ordering to be struck out that part of the defence which was set up by the wife. There are two separate and distinct defendants to this action, and each of them is entitled to set up such a defence as seems right to each. The husband is liable for the tort of the wife, and the wife is also personally liable for her own tort. The Married Women's Property Act 1882, by sect. 1 (2), has not in any way altered the personal liability of the wife for her own tort; it has only made the wife liable to be sued without her husband being joined, and has made her liable to satisfy the damages out of her separate estate:

Earle v. Kingscote, 83 L. T. Rep. 377; (1900) 2 Ch. 585.

The liability of the wife always was a personal liability at common law, which survived after the death of her husband; and an action against husband and wife did not abate upon the death of the husband:

Capel v. Powell, 17 C. B. N. S. 743.

The disability of the wife by reason of which she could not be sued without her husband being joined was only a matter of procedure, and, being personally liable, she could formerly have been taken under a writ of ca. sa. upon a judgment against her husband and herself:

Weldon v. Winslow, 51 L. T. Rep. 643; 13 Q. B. Div. 784;

Scott v. Morley, 57 L. T. Rep. 919; 20 Q. B. Div. 120.

The wife is now liable to satisfy the damages out of her separate estate, and therefore she is entitled to defend separately in respect of her separate estate. There will be two judgments, one against the husband personally, and the other against the wife in respect of her separate estate. They must both be served with the writ (Order IX., r. 3); and each of them must enter an appearance. Order XXII., r. 1, provides that "any defendant" may pay money into court in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. That plainly means that any one of several persons who are sued jointly may pay money into court; and therefore one of these two defendants is entitled to take that course, and the other may set up any other defence denying liability.

J. A. Compston, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I see no ground for interfering with the order of the learned judge in this case. I think that the case is quite plain when once we arrive at the conclusion that this is the old common-law action of tort in which the husband is joined as a defendant, and that the old rules as to joining the husband in an action for a tort committed by the wife are still subsisting. It was at one time suggested in a well-known text-book that the effect of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 was to do away with the husband's liability for the torts of his wife, and to make the action one against the wife alone in respect of her separate property. That question was raised in the case of Seroka v. Kattenburg (54 L. T. Rep. 649; 17 Q. B. Div. 177), where Mathew and Smith, J.J., in a Divisional Court, held that the Act did not do away with the liability of a husband for his wife's wrongful acts, and that the husband and wife might still be sued jointly for those acts. The point was later brought before the Court of Appeal in Earle v. Kingscote (83 L. T. Rep. 377; (1900) 2 Ch. 585), and it was there held that the earlier case of Seroka v. Kattenburg (ubi sup.) had been rightly decided. Therefore the old common-law action against the husband and wife jointly in respect of a tort of the wife still subsists. The present action is carefully so framed. It is an action for damages for a tort of the wife, and the husband is simply joined as a defendant. There is no claim made under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 against the wife in respect of her separate estate. The action is simply in respect of the joint liability of the husband and wife. There is one tort only. The defence pleads a payment into court by the husband. That is, in this case, an admission of liability on behalf of both husband and wife, and it is incompatible with the other defence set up by the wife that there was no publication of the alleged libel. The learned judge, therefore, was quite right in ordering to be struck out that part of the defence which was incompatible with the payment into court. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. This being an action in the old common-law form against husband and wife jointly for the tort of the wife, there cannot be separate judgments against the husband and against the wife. The husband is liable and is sued only because he is the husband of the other defendant. There can be but one judgment against the two. The husband is entitled to say that there shall not be any judgment against him and his wife except upon the defence which he chooses to put in. If the contention of the appellants were right, this curious result might follow, that a defence might be put in by the husband and judgment go against both husband and wife upon that defence, and another judgment be given upon the separate defence set up by the wife. This is the ordinary common-law action, which must proceed in the ordinary way, and therefore there can be only one defence and one judgment. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

SNEADE v. WOTHERTON BARYTES AND LEAD MINING COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Remitting action to County Court—Claim on writ exceeding 100l.—Amendment of writ—Claim reduced to sum not exceeding 100l.—Jurisdiction to remit—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.

Where in an action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ in the first instance exceeds 100l., but the writ is subsequently amended and the claim reduced to a sum not exceeding 100l., there is jurisdiction to order the action to be tried in a County Court under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888.

APPEAL of the defendants from an order of Bucknill, J. at chambers ordering the action to be tried in a County Court.

The plaintiff, by the claim originally indorsed upon the writ, claimed the sum of 139l. from the defendants for goods sold and delivered.

The defendants set up the defence that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiff then applied at chambers for an order giving him leave to amend the writ by striking out all the items of his claim except one item amounting to 24l., and also for an order that the action should be tried in the County Court, under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888.

The master made an order giving leave to amend the writ, but refused to order the action to be tried in the County Court.

The County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43) provides :

Sect. 65. Where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed one hundred pounds, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded one hundred pounds, is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise to a sum not exceeding one hundred pounds, it shall be lawful for either party to the action at any time, if the whole or part of the demand of the plaintiff be contested, to apply to a judge of the High Court at chambers to order such action to be tried in any court in which the action might have been commenced, or in any court convenient thereto; and on the hearing of the application the judge shall, unless there is good cause to the contrary, order such action to be tried accordingly; and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge the original writ and the order with the registrar of the court mentioned in the order, who shall appoint a day for the trial of the action, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the registrar to both parties or their solicitors, and the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein; and the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the County Courts, and the costs of the order and all proceedings previously thereto shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff appealed, and Bucknill J. at chambers made an order that the action should be tried in the County Court.

Disturnal and S. R. C. Bosanquet for the appellants.—The learned judge had no jurisdiction to make an order that this action should be tried in the County Court. The words of sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888 are: "Where such claim, though it originally exceeded 100l., is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise to a sum not exceeding 100l." It was decided in the Court of Appeal in Hodgson v. Bell (62 L. T. Rep. 481; 24 Q. B. Div. 302) that "payment" there meant payment before action; and the ground of that decision was that the action must originally have been brought to recover a sum not exceeding 100l., and that therefore nothing which happened after the action was commenced to reduce the amount of the claim could give jurisdiction to remit the action. In the later case of Dierken v. Philpot (85 L. T. Rep. 246; (1901) 2 K. B. 380), in the Divisional Court, it was held that the principle of the former decision applied to the case where the plaintiff, who by his writ claimed more than 100l., afterwards abandoned the excess over 100l. when he applied for an order under sect. 65. The words "or otherwise," in sect. 65, must be construed as referring to something which has happened before action:

Foster v. Usherwood, 37 L. T. Rep. 339; 3 Ex. Div. 1.

In this case the amount originally claimed in the action exceeded 100l. The amendment of the writ, by which the amount of the claim was reduced, cannot make any difference, for it was something done after the action was commenced, and could not alter the fact that the amount for which the writ was originally indorsed exceeded 100*l.* This was in substance and reality an abandonment of part of the claim after the action was commenced, and is governed by the decision in Dierken v. Philpot (ubi sup.).

Re SPARK'S TRUSTS; MASSEY v. SPARK.

J. R. Randolph for the respondent.—The order of the learned judge was rightly made. The only question is whether there was jurisdiction to make the order under sect. 65 after leave had been given to amend the writ. The writ when it has been amended becomes the writ in the action, and is just as much the foundation of the action as if it had been in the first instance indorsed with a claim for the smaller sum. The reduced claim appears upon the writ itself, and this case therefore comes within the principle of the decision in Percival v. Pedley (18 Q. B. Div. 635), where it was held that the equivalent section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142 applied where the writ showed a set-off admitted by the plaintiff, though it was not admitted by the defendant. In Dierken v. Philpot (ubi sup.) it was held that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 65, because it appeared on the face of the writ that the claim exceeded 100*l.*, there being nothing on the writ to show that the claim had been reduced. The only writ in this action is the amended writ, and the claim which appears upon that writ is for 24*l.* only. An amendment relates back, and is substituted for the former claim just as if it had been made in the first instance :

Bosanquet replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendants from an order of Bucknill, J. made at chambers. The circumstances of this case are somewhat peculiar, and, in my judgment, are not covered by any of the authorities which have been cited. The action was commenced in the High Court by a writ upon which a claim was indorsed for 139*l.* After the action had proceeded for some time the plaintiff applied for leave to amend the writ by abandoning the whole of his claim except a sum of 24*l.*, and then applied that the action should be remitted to the County Court. The master gave leave to amend the writ as asked, but refused to remit the action to the County Court. The plaintiff then appealed to the judge from the refusal of the master to remit the action to the County Court. Upon that appeal Bucknill, J. made an order that the action should be tried in the County Court. The defendants have appealed, and the point is taken that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888 to order the action to be tried in the County Court. The provisions of sect. 65 are that : "Where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed 100*l.*, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded 100*l.*, is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise to a sum not exceeding 100*l.*," on the application of either party a judge may order the action to be tried in a County Court. Now, it has been held in a series of decisions that where the claim in an action as indorsed on the writ originally exceeded 100*l.*, the judge did not obtain jurisdiction to remit the action to the County Court by reason of any reduction subsequent to the issue of the writ, upon the ground that "payment" clearly pointed to something happening before action; and that where the reduction in the amount claimed arose from a payment made after action there was no jurisdiction to remit the action to a County Court. It has been contended that those decisions apply to the present case. But in this case the application to remit was not made upon the ground of any reduction in the amount claimed, but upon the ground of the substitution of a claim for 24*l.* for the amount originally claimed by reason of the writ having been amended. The writ, though amended, still remains the writ in the action, and is still the commencement of the action. When an amendment of this kind is asked for, proper terms ought to be imposed, because the substituted claim becomes the original claim in the action. In the present case the amendment was allowed upon certain terms, and the amended writ became the initial stage in the action; the amended claim was substituted for the previous claim. Therefore this amended writ initiated this action; and the claim indorsed thereon was for 24*l.* only. If at first the writ had been indorsed with a claim for 24*l.* only, it would clearly have been proper to remit this action to a County Court. The fact that the writ has been amended so as to claim only the smaller sum does not impose any condition making it necessary for the plaintiff to try the action in the High Court. It is possible, with leave, to substitute a reduced claim for a larger claim originally indorsed upon the writ, and, when that is done, the plaintiff is in the same position as if he had only made the smaller claim in the first instance. A reduction of the claim by amendment is not the same as if a claim is made in the action and then there is a reduction by payment or set-off. This case is entirely outside the principle governing the cases which have been cited. The order of the learned judge was therefore right, and this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons, and I have nothing to add.

Re SPARK'S TRUSTS; MASSEY v. SPARK. (a)

Separation deed—Construction—Voluntary settlement or deed of separation—Reconciliation—Trust for children.

Where articles of agreement under seal are entered into between husband, wife, and a trustee, reciting that the husband, who was entitled to a share of residuum under a will, as a condition of a mutual separation which had been agreed on, had agreed to assign his interest under the will to the trustee upon trust to pay the interest thereof to the wife and then as to the principal for the three children of the marriage, and the wife covenants not to molest the husband, and are followed by a separation and nine months afterwards by reconciliation and return to cohabitation :

Held, that, upon the true construction of the articles, the trusts thereby declared in favour of the wife and children were subsisting notwithstanding the reconciliation, and that there was no resulting trust for the settlor, the husband, of the property comprised therein.

Bindley v. Mulloney (20 L. T. Rep. 263; L. Rep. 7 Eq. 343) distinguished.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS raising the question whether the articles of agreement following, in the circumstances hereunder set out, constituted a revocable deed of separation or a voluntary settlement the trusts of which were still subsisting.

Articles of agreement made this twenty-fifth day of February 1893 between John Ernest Hunt Spark, of Brixton-road, tobacconist, of the "one" part, and Mary Edith his wife of the second part, and Henry Richard Suffield Massey of the third part. Whereas the said J. E. H. Spark has been guilty of adultery and other misconduct towards his wife, and, in order to prevent proceedings being taken against him by her and as a condition of a mutual separation which has been agreed upon between them and also in consideration of the said wife taking the care and custody of the three children of the marriage, the husband has consented to enter into the following agreement and the said wife the following covenant—namely, the said J. E. H. Spark doth hereby as beneficial owner assign to the said R. H. Suffield Massey all his share and interest under the will of his late grandmother, H. S. Bewsher (save the sum of 200*l.* and a sum sufficient to pay the costs of and incidental to this assignment), upon trust to pay the annual interest and proceeds thereof to the said M. E. Spark his wife for her life and from and after her decease to divide the same equally between such of the said children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters marry under that age, and in consideration of such assignment the said M. E. Spark hereby covenants not to molest the said J. E. H. Spark or to compel him to pay directly or indirectly for the maintenance of herself or the said children. And all the said parties hereby mutually agree to execute any further deed that may be necessary to carry out the assignments and covenants herein contained. As witness the hands and seals of the parties hereto the twenty-fifth day of February 1893.

The above articles were duly signed, sealed, and delivered by the three parties thereto.

Mr. and Mrs. Spark were married on the 31st March 1889, and on the 25th Feb. 1893 there was issue of the marriage the three infant defendants.

Shortly before the 25th Feb. 1893 unhappy differences arose between the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Spark, and they consequently decided to separate and live apart from one another.

The defendant J. E. H. Spark had then recently become entitled under the will of his grandmother, H. S. Bewsher, to an undivided moiety of her residuary estate, and he received from the trustees of her will (of whom the plaintiff H. R. S. Massey was one) payments on account thereof, but the greater part of his share remained invested.

Pending the separation between Mr. and Mrs. Spark, it was arranged that he should make some provision for her and the infant defendants, and the agreement above set out was executed.

Mr. and Mrs. Spark thereupon separated and lived apart from one another, the wife taking the custody of the infant defendants.

Mr. and Mrs. Spark, however, became reconciled and resumed cohabitation before the end of 1893. Since that time they have continuously lived together, three other children being born in the years 1896, 1899, and 1901.

Mr. and Mrs. Spark, wishing to make provision for their children, in Nov. 1903 applied to the plaintiff to treat the agreement of the 25th Feb. 1893 as at an end, inasmuch as they had become reconciled and were then cohabiting together and the separation therein contemplated had come to an end, and requested the plaintiff to transfer and assure the funds and property representing the share subject to the agreement to the defendant J. E. H. Spark, discharged from its operation.

The trustee had paid the interest to the wife under the agreement.

H. Greenwood, for the plaintiff trustee, stated the facts. The question is whether the document is a separation deed or a voluntary settlement. There are two lines of reported cases, in one of them, where the document has been held to be a separation deed, it is entirely put an end to by reconciliation; but the trusts of a voluntary settlement are unaffected by resumption of cohabitation by the husband and wife parties to it:

H. v. W., 3 K. & J. 382;

Nicol v. Nicol, 54 L. T. Rep. 470; 31 Ch. Div. 524;

Westmeath v. Salisbury, 5 Bli. (N. S.) 339;

Bindley v. Mulloney, 20 L. T. Rep. 263; L. Rep. 7 Eq. 343.

Ward Coldridge, for the defendant J. E. H. Spark, submitted that this was a separation deed. With the single exception of Ruffles v. Alston (32 L. T. Rep. 236; L. Rep. 19 Eq. 539), there is no case which suggests that such a deed as this is not a separation deed. There the property was the wife's. It was not a case of the husband providing for the wife. The question whether there had been a reconciliation in Westmeath v. Salisbury (ubi sup.) was tried in Ireland in the absence of the daughter, who was a beneficiary under the deed, consequently the House of Lords would not bind her by the evidence called to prove cohabitation. If the deed was a voluntary settlement, the question of cohabitation is immaterial: (per Lord Eldon at pp. 376, 377, and 402). Bindley v. Mulloney (ubi sup.) shows that consideration is necessary to support the provision for children. Here the whole provision for the three children was based on separation, and nothing has been shown to take this case out of the ordinary doctrine as to separation deeds.

Leonard Mossop for the wife and children.—Westmeath v. Salisbury (ubi sup.) was an instance of a separation deed containing trusts for a child of the marriage. But in that case the House of Lords declined to declare the deed void as against the child: (per Lord Eldon, at p. 417). For the children, I say that this deed goes beyond a separation deed. Directly you have an ultimate trust in favour of children taking effect after the death of the wife, the deed has gone beyond the scope of a separation deed. In Hulme v. Chitty (9 Beav. 437) the child born after reconciliation did not take under the deed. In Bindley v. Mul- loney (ubi sup.) the husband and wife never separated. The deed there was conditional on separation taking place: (vide Jessel, K.C.'s argument). That case is no authority that the gift to the child is necessarily part of the deed quoad separation deed. Ruffles v. Alston (ubi sup.) shows that a deed containing provisions for children is not void on reconciliation between their parents. The precedents only contain provision for the maintenance and education during the life of the wife:

6 Byth. & Jarm. Conv., pp. 96, 98, 4th edit., by Robbins.

Here the trustee continued to pay the dividends of the life interest to the wife, and the presumption which might have arisen in the case of an ordinary separation deed, that it is intended to come to an end with reconciliation is rebutted:

Webster v. Webster, 21 L. T. Rep. O. S. 192; 4 De G. M. & G. 437.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a point of some interest to persons who have to advise husband and wife as to arrangements to be made on a separation, and the point to be decided depends really upon the proper effect to be given to, and the proper construction of, an agreement of the 25th Feb. 1893. It is desirable to look at it for a moment apart from the motive which led to its execution—which was, no doubt, a separation. There was an assignment to the trustee by the husband of "all his share and interest under the will of his late grandmother, Hannah Sarah Bewsher, upon trust to pay the annual interest and proceeds thereof to Mary Edith Spark his wife for her life, and from and after her decease to divide the same equally between such of the said children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters marry under that age." That is a perfectly good voluntary settlement within all the authorities to which reference is always made, such as Kekewich v. Manning (1 De G. M. & G. 176). A perfect trust is declared. There is a parting with his interest by the husband under his grandmother's will which gives the trustee the right to sue for the share and to hold it, when received, upon the trusts contained in the agreement. It is a perfectly voluntary settlement. If so, it can only be worked out after the performance of the trust—the ultimately handing over the property to those entitled to it. So that if it can be regarded from that point of view, there is no doubt that it is enforceable by the court. It is said that that is not the proper view to take of this deed, because it was made in view of a separation. It provides for the wife's maintaining herself and these children. Therefore if I can treat this simply as a provision for the wife during the separation, then, the parties having been reconciled, the consideration fails, and there is no reason why the settlement should not be declared void. There are two points of view from which the transaction can be regarded. On the one hand, separation is the paramount cause without which this agreement would never have existed; on the other, though brought into existence by that cause on the occasion of a separation between husband and wife, it does contain an assignment of the share of the husband under the will upon his wife and children in the way I have mentioned. Which ought

I to hold? Can I say that the trustee is safe in departing from the terms of the deed and giving up all this property? The decision in the House of Lords in Westmeath v. Salisbury (ubi sup.) does not decide this point. There the same question did not arise for decision, and the deed was held to be void on different grounds. The case of Bindley v. Mulloney before Lord Romilly, M.R. (ubi sup.) seems to me to be entirely different from this on account of the ground of the decision there. The deed was similar to this, and might have been held to be a separation deed. There is no doubt that that might have been held to constitute a settlement in the Court of Chancery. But what the Master of the Rolls held was that the consideration failed. He says: "Separation was the consideration upon which it was based." I do not mean to say that he did not say more than that. But that was the main point of his decision. I must, of course, assume that he was correct in coming to that conclusion. No separation had taken place, and the consideration failed. Here the consideration has not failed, and I am not asked to set aside this deed on that ground. He held that the consideration failed, and he did also hold that the deed was a separation deed. The precise point was before Malins, V.C. in Ruffles v. Alston (ubi sup.). There the deed took the form of a voluntary settlement, and, as such, was within the doctrine of Kekewich v. Manning (ubi sup.). Under these circumstances the Vice-Chancellor held it to be more than a separation deed. The case was argued on demurrer to the bill so as to set aside the settlement on the ground of reconciliation, and the demurrer was overruled on the ground that the child was entitled to maintain a bill for enforcing the settlement. The same principle applies to this deed here. The separation was the cause of it, and it resulted in the settlement of this share. That being so, I cannot see that the reconciliation affects the voluntary settlement thereby created, and I declare to that effect. All costs to come out of the fund, those of the plaintiff to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Re EUPHRATES AND TIGRIS STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Company—Alteration of memorandum of association — Jurisdiction — Company incorporated under Joint Stock Companies Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47), but not registered under Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 8)—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62).

A company incorporated in 1861 under the Joint Stock Companies Act 1856 as a company limited by shares, but not registered under the Companies Act 1862, having increased its share capital and its business, passed a special resolution, in accordance with sect. 51 of the Companies Act 1862, for extending and defining its objects set out in its memorandum of association, and petitioned the court under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 to confirm the special resolution.

(a) Reported by J. TRUSTEAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, notwithstanding the fact that the company was not registered under the Companies Act 1862, the court had jurisdiction to confirm the special resolution.

Re Nitrophosphate and Odams Chemical Manure Company Limited (1893) W. N. 141; Re Hong Kong and China Gas Company Limited (106 L. T. 125; (1898) W. N. 158 (3); and Re Copiapo Mining Company (106 L. T. 411); (1899) W. N. 25) followed; and Re General Credit Company (1891) W. N. 153) dissented from.

PETITION by the company that the alteration of the company's objects proposed to be effected by the special resolution set forth in par. 4 of the petition might be confirmed by the court pursuant to the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890.

The company was incorporated in 1861 under the Joint Stock Companies Acts 1856 to 1890 as a company limited by shares with a capital of 15,000*l.* divided into 300 shares of 50*l.* each, which at the date of the petition had been increased to 100,000*l.* divided into 2000 shares of 50*l.* each, of which 1000 shares only have been issued and were fully paid up.

The objects for which the company was established were set forth in clause 3 of the memorandum of association as follows :

The objects for which the company is established are to convey passengers and merchandise on the rivers Euphrates and Tigris and their tributaries and on the Persian Gulf, and to and from Kurahee and any ports or places in the Persian Gulf or Indian Ocean, and to build or otherwise provide vessels, and to purchase or provide stores and all necessaries for such vessels, and to do all acts necessary for or incident to the attainment of such objects or any of them.

The petition further stated :

By special resolution of the company duly passed and confirmed in accordance with sect. 51 of the Companies Act 1862 at extraordinary general meetings of the company held respectively on the 24th June 1903 and the 9th July 1903 it was resolved as follows—that is to say : That the objects of the company set forth in clause 3 of its memorandum of association be altered by inserting immediately before the words and to do all acts necessary the following words : “ To establish, open, and regulate stores and markets and to purchase goods, products, cattle, live stock, hardware, provisions solid and liquid, and any other merchandise whatsoever for the purpose of freightage any vessels or medium of transport of the company, or for the supply of any such stores or markets, and to develop traffic on the rivers aforesaid and their tributaries and on the said gulf and ocean and elsewhere in the east, and, further, to do all or any of the things following—that is to say : (1) To construct, carry out, maintain, improve, manage, work, control, and superintend any roads, dams, ways, tramways, railways, branches or sidings, bridges, reservoirs, canals, docks, wharves, watercourses, hydraulic works, gasworks, electric works, factories, warehouses, and other works and conveniences in Mesopotamia, Persia, or elsewhere in Western Asia which may seem directly or indirectly conducive to any of the company's objects, and contribute to subsidise or otherwise assist or take part in such maintenance, management, working, control, and superintendence. (2) To purchase or otherwise acquire and undertake all or any part of the business, property, and liabilities of any person or company carrying on any business which this company is authorised to carry on or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company. (3) To enter into any arrangement with any Government or authorities, supreme, municipal, local, or otherwise, and to obtain from any such Government or authority all rights, concessions, and privileges that may seem conducive to the company's objects or any of them. (4) To enter into any arrangement for sharing profits, union of interest, joint adventure, reciprocal concessions, or co-operation with any person, association, or company carrying on or engaged in or about to carry on or engage in any business or transaction which the company is authorised to carry on or engage in, or any business or transaction capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit this company, and to take or otherwise acquire and hold shares or stock in or securities of and to subsidise or otherwise assist any such association or company, and to sell, hold, or reissue with or without guarantee or otherwise deal with such shares, stock, or securities. (5) Generally to purchase, take on lease or in exchange, hire, or otherwise acquire any real or personal property, or any rights or privileges which the company may think necessary or convenient with reference to any of these objects or capable of being profitably dealt with in connection with any of the company's property or rights for the time being, and in particular any land, buildings, easements, licences, patents, machinery, ships, barges, rolling stock, plant, and stock-in-trade. (6) To sell any part of the undertaking, or property of the company for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular for shares or debentures, debenture stock, or other securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of this company. (7) To promote any company or companies for the purpose of acquiring all or any of the property, rights, and liabilities of the company or for any other purpose which may seem directly or indirectly calculated to benefit this company. (8) To lend money to such persons and on such terms as may seem expedient, and in particular to customers of and persons having dealings with the company, and to give any guarantee or indemnity as may seem expedient. (9) To obtain any Act of Parliament for enabling the company to carry any of its objects into effect, or for effecting any modification of the company's constitution, or for any other purpose which may seem expedient, and to oppose any proceedings or applications which may seem calculated directly or indirectly to prejudice the company. (10) To raise or borrow or secure the payment of money in such manner and on such terms as may seem expedient, and in particular by the issue of debentures or debenture stock, whether perpetual or otherwise and charged or not charged upon the whole or any part of the property of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital, and to redeem, purchase, or pay off any such securities. (11) To draw, accept, indorse, discount, execute, and issue bills of exchange, promissory notes, debentures, bills of lading, warrants, and other negotiable or transferable instruments or securities. (12) To sell, improve, manage, develop, exchange, enfranchise, lease, mortgage, dispose of, turn to account, or otherwise deal with all or any part of the property or rights of the company.”

It is apprehended that on the true construction of the company's memorandum of association the existing objects of the company comprise some of the objects set forth in the said special resolution, but it was thought desirable, in accordance with modern practice, to express the objects of the company in greater detail, so as to avoid and preclude so far as may be all doubts as to the company's powers within the ordinary scope of its business. So far as the adoption of such objects involves an extension of the present objects, such extension is required to enable the company to carry on its business more economically and more efficiently than heretofore, and to attain its main purpose by new or improved means and also to enlarge the local area of its operations, and, further, to enable it to carry on some business or businesses which under existing circumstances may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company. The company has extensive opportunities of doing business of the character authorised by the proposed extension of objects, and experience has shown that its objects as they stand are inconveniently restricted, and that its existing business is detrimentally affected by the absence of the powers which would be conferred by the objects set forth in the said resolution. The company has no debenture debt whatever, but is usually indebted to general creditors for wages and salaries and otherwise to the extent of about 700*l.*, though this indebtedness varies from day to day as the accounts come in and are paid off. The financial position of the company is good. It has accumulated a reserve fund which at the date of the last balance-sheet issued by the directors—that is to say, of the 31st December 1902—stood at 19,500*l.*, and at this same date had an insurance fund of 25,915*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, and at the date of the said last balance-sheet the position was as follows: Assets, 109,819*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*; debts and liabilities (including reserve fund and insurance fund, but excluding liability in respect of share capital), 50,303*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*; surplus, 59,515*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* The company has, moreover, unissued 1000 shares of 50*l.* each, or 50,000*l.* of capital. The position of the company since the date of the said balance-sheet has not materially altered except that a further 5000*l.* has been carried to the reserve fund. The profits of the company for the year ending the 31st December 1902 were upwards of 9500*l.* The market value of the company's shares is 76*l.* per share, or thereabouts. No one will be prejudiced by the proposed extension of the company's objects, and it is just and equitable that the said special resolution for the proposed extension of such objects should be confirmed.

The company had not been registered under the Companies Act 1862.

Ere, K.C. M.P., and R. J. Parker for the petition.—The question is whether the company, which has not been registered under the Companies Act 1862, is entitled to present this petition without being registered under that Act, and the authorities are in its favour, as Kekewich, J. in Re Nitrophosphate and Odams Chemical Manure Company Limited (1893) W. N. 141 and in Re Hong Kong and China Gas Company Limited (106 L. T. 125; (1898) W. N. 158 (3) and Wright, J. in Re Copiapo Mining Company (116 L. T. 411; (1899) W. N. 25) held that such a company could present such a petition, while the only decision to the contrary is that by Romer, J. in Re General Credit Company (1891) W. N. 153). We submit that it is not necessary for the petitioning company to be registered under the Companies Act 1862.

EADY, J.—I think I may accede to your argument. Sect. 3, sub-sect. 2, of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 provides: "This Act and the Companies Acts 1862 to 1886 shall be construed as one Act." Then sect. 176 of the Companies Act 1862 provides: "Subject as hereinafter mentioned, this Act, with the exception of table A in the 1st schedule, shall apply to companies formed and registered under the said Joint Stock Companies Acts"—which expression is by the preceding section defined to include the Joint Stock Companies Act 1856, under the provisions of which the company is registered—"or any of them in the same manner in the case of a limited company as if such company had been formed and registered under this Act as a company limited by shares." I think I am justified in following the decisions of Kekewich, J. in Re Nitrophosphate and Odams Chemical Manure Company Limited (ubi sup.) and Re Hong Kong and China Gas Company Limited (ubi sup.) and of Wright, J. in Re Copiapo Mining Company (ubi sup.), and holding that a company registered under the Joint Stock Companies Act 1856 may present a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 for the alteration of its objects as set forth in its memorandum of association although it has not been also registered under the Companies Act 1862.

CAREY (app.) v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, and BURGESSES OF BEXHILL. (a)

Local government—Private street works—Apportionment of expenses on frontager—Notice of objection—Objection that street is not a street within meaning of Act—Evidence that street is repairable by inhabitants at large—Admissibility—Private Street Works Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 5, 7, 8.

Sect. 7 of the Private Street Works Act 1892 enables the owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing private street works under the Act to serve a written notice on the urban authority, objecting to the proposals of the urban authority, on the grounds (amongst others): (a) That an alleged street is not a street within the meaning of the Act; and (b) that a street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; and by sect. 5 a "street" means a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, "and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large."

Held, that sub-sect. (a) includes and overlaps sub-sect. (b), and that under a notice of objection given under sub-sect. (a) "that the alleged part of a street does not form part of a street within the meaning of the Act," the objector is entitled to give evidence that the street in question is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, although that ground of objection is specifically dealt with in sub-sect. (b).

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the petty sessional division of Hastings, in the county of Sussex

Upon the application of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Bexhill, acting by the council as the urban sanitary authority for the borough, the justices sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Bexhill heard and determined the matter of certain objections raised by Henry Carey (the appellant) to a certain provisional apportionment in respect of the expenses of executing certain proposed works in Springfield-road, Bexhill, under and by virtue of the Private Street Works Act 1892.

(a) Reported by W. W. Oms, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.] CAREY (app.) v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, & BURGESSES OF BEXHILL. [K.B. Div.]

The justices, after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them, disallowed the objections.

Upon the hearing of the objections, the following facts (amongst others) were admitted or proved:—

The Bexhill Urban District Council, having duly adopted the Private Street Works Act 1892, resolved to make up Springfield-road in a certain manner.

On the 20th Oct. 1902 the council passed a resolution that the plans, specifications, estimates, and provisional apportionments of proposed private street works of sewerage, levelling, paving, and making good the Springfield-road submitted to the district council by the surveyor be approved, and that the necessary steps be taken for the carrying out of such works in accordance with such specifications, and also in accordance with the Private Street Works Act 1892.

By a charter of incorporation the rights and powers of the Bexhill Urban District Council passed to the respondents on the 9th Nov. 1902.

The appellant was the owner of two freehold pieces of land having frontages of 82ft. and 95ft. respectively to a portion of the Springfield-road referred to in the resolution, and the total estimated apportionment charged to him was 134l. 9s. 10d. Within the time provided by the Act the appellant gave to the council the following notice, dated the 20th Dec. 1902:

I hereby give you notice that I the undersigned, being the owner of certain land numbered 7 and 8 on the plan and provisional apportionment relating to the portion of the said road referred to in the said resolution and therein shown as liable to be charged with part of the expenses of the above-mentioned works, object to your proposals in the matter on the following grounds or some or one of them: (1) That the alleged part of a street does not form a part of a street within the meaning of the Act. [There were other grounds of objection which are not now material]

At the hearing, the borough surveyor proved in his evidence in chief that Springfield-road was the only approach to another road called Beaconsfield-road; that there was a public footpath running along part of the site of the proposed road on the south-east side—that is to say, on the side next to the appellant's land—but he stated that this footpath was not repairable by the inhabitants at large and had never been repaired by the urban district council, and he added that, if it were, the corporation would have to repair all the footpaths in the district.

The appellant tendered evidence to show that it was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, but the justices refused to admit the evidence, on the ground that no notice of this objection had been given under sect. 7, sub-sect. (b), of the Private Street Works Act 1892.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant (inter alia) that he was entitled to call evidence of the existence of a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, because, although he had not given notice of objection under sub-sect. (b) of sect. 7 of the Private Street Works Act 1892, he had given notice under sub-sect. (a). He relied upon the difference in the definition of the word "street" in sect. 5 of the Private Street Works Act 1892 and the definition in the Public Health Acts.

The appellant also relied on Rishton v. Haslingden Corporation (77 L. T. Rep. 620; (1898) 1 Q. B. 294). He further contended that, as the respondents were in no way taken by surprise, the justices should amend the notice of objection.

The justices decided that, in order to give them jurisdiction under this Act, the question of whether the street was in whole or in part a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large must be specifically raised upon a notice of objection given under sect. 7, sub-sect. (b), and that notice under sub-sect. (a) alone was not sufficient to enable the objector to raise the point. They also held that, in view of sect. 8, sub-sect. 2, of the same Act, they had no power to amend the notice of objection.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (amongst others not now material): (1) Whether the justices were right in excluding evidence of the existence of a footpath repairable by the inhabitants at large without notice of objection having been given under sub-sect. (b). If they were wrong, then the case was to be referred back to them to take evidence on the point. (2) Whether the justices had jurisdiction to amend the notice, and, if so, were bound to do so in favour of the appellant. If they were wrong as to that, the case was to be referred back to them to be reheard on an amended notice.

The Private Street Works Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57) provides:

Sect. 1. This Act . . . shall be construed as one with the Public Health Acts, and shall extend only to England; and this Act and the Public Health Acts may be cited together as the Public Health Acts.

Sect. 2. This Act shall extend and apply to any urban sanitary district in which it is respectively adopted under the provisions of this Act.

Sect. 5. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the expression "street" means (unless the context otherwise requires) a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Sect. 6 (1). Where any street or part of a street is not sewered, levelled, paved, . . . made good, and lighted to the satisfaction of the urban authority, the urban authority may from time to time resolve with respect to such street or part of a street to do any one or more of the following works (in this Act called private street works); that is to say, to sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel, or make good, or to provide proper means for lighting such street or part of a street; and the expenses incurred by the urban authority in executing private street works shall be apportioned (subject as in this Act mentioned) on the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such street or part of a street.

Sect. 7. During the said month [that is, one month from the date of the first publication of the resolution of the urban authority approving the specifications, plans, estimates, and provisional apportionments] any owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing the works may, by written notice served on the urban authority, object to the proposals of the urban authority on any of the following grounds; that is to say, (a) that an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act; (b) that a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Sect. 8 (1). The urban authority at any time after the expiration of the said month may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of all objections made as in this Act mentioned, and shall publish a notice of the time and place appointed, and copies of such notice shall be served upon the objectors; and at the time and place so appointed any such court may proceed to hear and determine the matter of all such objections in the same manner as nearly as may be, and with the same powers and subject to the same provisions with respect to stating a case, as if the urban authority were proceeding summarily against the objectors to enforce payment of a sum of money summarily recoverable. The court may quash in whole or in part or may amend the resolution, plans, sections, estimates, and provisional apportionments, or any of them, on the application either of any objector or of the urban authority. The court may also, if it thinks fit, adjourn the hearing and direct any further notices to be given. (2) No objection which could be made under this Act shall be otherwise made or allowed in any court, proceeding, or manner whatsoever.

J. R. Macoun for the appellant.—The justices ought to have admitted the appellant's evidence tendered to show that this road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. By sect. 5 a street means a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, "and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." The definition of "street" in the Public Health Acts is given in sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875; and, taking the definition in sect. 5 of the Act of 1892, it is clear that this evidence was admissible under the notice of objection given. If this footpath were a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, then it would not come within the definition of "street" in sect. 5, and would therefore not be a street "within the meaning of the Act," so that, under the notice of objection that the street did not form part of a street within the meaning of the Act, it could be shown that the street was repairable by the inhabitants at large, as that would necessarily show that it was not a street within the meaning of the Act. Here the appellant gave his notice under sub-sect. (a) of sect. 7. If he had given his notice under sub-sect. (b), he clearly would have been entitled to give this evidence; but it is submitted that sub-sect. (a) includes and overlaps sub-sect. (b), and therefore an objection under sub-sect. (b) that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large necessarily can be brought under sub-sect. (a). The justices were therefore wrong in refusing to admit this evidence. Secondly, the justices had power to adjourn, and to order an amended notice to be given. That power is given in express terms in the concluding words of sect. 8, sub-sect. 1, where it is said: "The court may also, if it thinks fit, adjourn the hearing, and direct any further notices to be given." The justices were therefore wrong in not amending the notice.

Macmorran, K.C. (C. A. M. Barlow with him) for the respondents.—[Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Why should not this notice be amended?] There was no power to amend the notice, as the jurisdiction of the justices to deal with the matter only arises on the notice of objection which the objector has given, nor is there any power given to the justices to adjourn the hearing in order that a fresh notice may be given where the time for giving the notice under sect. 7 has expired. If there is no notice given in a month, there is no jurisdiction in the justices to deal with a case of this kind. The object of the Legislature in specifying the different grounds of objection in sect. 7 was to give the local authority an opportunity of knowing and being prepared to meet the particular ground of objection relied upon. The real question, however, in the case is whether under a notice of objection given under sub-sect. (a), the objection specified in sub-sect. (b) can be given in evidence. It is submitted that it cannot, and that the two sub-sections deal with totally different things. Sub-sect. (a) is intended to deal with a different point altogether from that which is intended to be dealt with in sub-sect. (b). Sub-sect. (a) is intended to deal with the case where the objection is that the alleged street is not a street at all:

Reg. v. Recorder of Sheffield, 50 L. T. Rep. 76; Wake v. Mayor, &c., of Sheffield, 12 Q. B. Div. 142.

But if the objection is that the street is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, then the notice ought to be given under sub-sect. (b), and the point specifically raised under that sub-section. If it is not so raised under sub-sect. (b), the justices have no jurisdiction to entertain it; and, as it was not so raised in this case, the justices were right in excluding the evidence.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I really cannot understand why this view of the matter was pressed against the admissibility of this evidence. With regard to the power to amend the notice of objection, I do not want to decide that there is no power to amend at all. If it becomes necessary to decide that question we may require further argument, but I must say that I do not at present wish it to be thought that magistrates who are hearing these objections cannot, in a proper case and subject to any questions they may raise as to costs, adjourn a case in order that a further notice may be given. I do not, however, wish to decide that question. In my opinion this evidence was clearly admissible, even upon the notice which was given. The section allows an objector to give a notice "that an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act"; or "that a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." Now, the definition of "street" is given in sect. 5, and it says that it is a street as defined by the Public Health Acts and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. Under that definition, as my brother Kennedy has pointed out, the objector may give a notice of objection under sub-sect. (a) which will traverse all the allegations of fact which are necessary to prove that the alleged street is a street within the meaning of the Public Health Acts, and that it is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. It may very likely be that the effect of that is to bring a good many more things into issue. Why it should be said, under that, that a person may not give evidence of that which would prevent the street from coming within the definition of street as defined by this Act, I cannot understand. I think it is quite possible, as has been pointed out, that if an objector wanted to raise that one strict point alone, he could raise it under sub-sect. (b). In my opinion the two sub-sections do overlap to this extent, that under this sub-sect. (a) it may be a ground for saying not only that a street is not a street within the meaning of this Act, but also that it does not fulfil the condition of not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. Therefore, without deciding the question whether or not, in a case where the terms of the notice did not allow the person objecting to raise the question at all, the justices could have allowed him to amend his notice and adjourn the case, I think in this case they ought to have received the evidence. The case must therefore go back in order that they may receive the evidence, and if any point of law does arise they will be able to bring it before us. I ought to add that the ground upon which the magistrates decided that they could not allow amendment—namely, that in view of sect. 8, subsect. 2, of the Act they had no power to amend the notice of objection—was obviously not the right ground. In my opinion that provision that no objection which could be made under that Act should be otherwise made or allowed in any court, proceeding, or manner whatsoever, applies to proceedings in other courts and not to proceedings in that court.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION, IN BANKRUPTCY.

Dec. 7 and 12, 1903.

Re JOHNSON; Ex parte MATTHEWS AND WILKINSON. (a)

Bankruptcy—Settlement—Settlor's own property—Trust to pay income to settlor determinable on bankruptcy—Discretionary power of trustees to apply income for benefit of settlor, or his children, or to accumulate—Second bankruptcy—Debtor unmarried—Right of trustee to income of settled funds.

In 1893 the debtor assigned property to trustees on trust to pay him the income until he was declared bankrupt. Thereafter his rights were to cease, and a discretionary power was given to his trustees to apply the income of any part thereof to the maintenance of the debtor, or for the benefit of his children, or to accumulate. In 1900 the settlor was adjudicated bankrupt, and under sect. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 an order was made setting aside the settlement so far as necessary to pay the provable debts. The trustees raised sufficient to pay in full the debts and costs, but the bankruptcy was not annulled. In 1902 the debtor was again adjudicated bankrupt. The trustee in this bankruptcy failed to obtain an order under sect. 47, the judge finding as a fact that at the time of making the settlement the debtor was able to pay all his debts without the property comprised in it. The trustee then applied for a declaration that the life estate of the bankrupt vested in him. The debtor was unmarried.

Held, that the debtor's life interest became forfeited on the first bankruptcy, when the income became vested under the control and discretion of the trustees, and it could only be divested by impeaching the settlement.

APPEAL from the decision of the County Court judge of Lancashire sitting at Manchester.

Leigh Clare for the appellants.

Carrington for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—PHILLIMORE, J. read the following judgment of the court, which fully sets out the facts:—The bankrupt Johnson, being then and now an unmarried man, and having then only just come of age, made on the 1st Sept. 1903 a settlement of certain property, of which settlement the appellants are the present trustees. The property settled was a share of residue passing under the grandfather's will; and the grandfather, when bequeathing legacies to his sons for their lives, had made such legacies determinable on bankruptcy, or upon the assignment or charge of the annual income. For some reason, into which it is not important to inquire, the settlement made by the bankrupt Johnson, instead of expressing the trust and limitations explicitly, stated them by way of reference to the grandfather's will. There is, however, no dispute what these trusts and limitations are, though they have to be gathered from the two instruments. The settlor assigned property to the trustees on trust to pay him the annual income until he was declared bankrupt, or should assign or charge in any way the annual income. Thereafter his rights were to cease, and the trustees were to have power to apply or not, as they thought fit, the income or any part for his personal maintenance and support, and were to apply the residue, if any, for the benefit of his children, if there were any, or to accumulate it and add it to the corpus, which corpus was ultimately to go to certain relations. In 1900 there was a first adjudication in bankruptcy. The trustee in that bankruptcy moved, under sect. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, to set aside the settlement, and it was set aside so far as was necessary to pay the bankrupt's debts provable in that bankruptcy. Thereupon, under an order made by consent, the trustees of the settlement raised a sufficient sum to pay the bankrupt's debts in full and the costs. The bankruptcy, however, does not seem to have been formally annulled. In 1903 there was a second bankruptcy. The trustee in that bankruptcy again applied to set aside the settlement; but this time he failed, the County Court judge finding as a fact that at the time of making the settlement the bankrupt was able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in it. The trustee in bankruptcy then applied to have it adjudged and declared that the life estate of the bankrupt vested in him, the said trustee, and that he was entitled to the income thereof with the arrears. He obtained an order in these terms, and this is the order now under appeal. Now, an owner of property cannot by way of settlement or contract qualify his own interest in property by a condition determining or controlling it, in the event of his own bankruptcy, to the disappointment or delay of his creditors. This was decided in Wilson v. Greenwood (1 Swans. 471, 481; 18

R. R. 118), and that decision has been followed in a number of cases, many of which will be found enumerated in Mackintosh v. Pogose (72 L. T. Rep. 251; (1895) 1 Ch. 305). But this rule applies only to a limitation upon bankruptcy, and to cases where, but for this limitation, the property or income would have come to the assignee or trustee in bankruptcy, and then only so far as it would have thus come. Thus, in Re Detmold; Detmold v. Detmold (61 L. T. Rep. 21; 40 Ch. Div. 585), the husband settlor, with a similar clause, suffered an incumbrance of his income by the appointment of a receiver at the suit of a judgment creditor on the 19th July 1888. In or about September of the same year he was adjudicated a bankrupt upon an act of bankruptcy committed on the 29th July. It was held that before the act of bankruptcy there had been a forfeiture by the husband owing to the appointment of a receiver; that the limitation over to the wife upon such forfeiture was good, inasmuch as it defeated a particular alienee, and was not a fraud on the bankruptcy laws; that, therefore, the gift over had taken effect before bankruptcy, the income had become vested in the wife, and there was nothing for the trustee in bankruptcy to take. Following this authority, the judge in Re Brewer's Settlement; Morton v. Blackmore (75 L. T. Rep. 177; (1896) 2 Ch. 503) stated as follows the point which he had to determine: "The question is whether the life interest had determined previously to the bankruptcy." In that case it was held that what had been done previously to the bankruptcy did not amount to forfeiture or determination of the life interest, and, therefore, the trustee in bankruptcy took the life interest. In the case before us, the trustee in the first bankruptcy, if he had failed in setting aside the settlement, would have succeeded in getting the bankrupt's life interest under it, because to allow the limitation over to take effect would have been, in the language of the cases, a "fraud upon the bankruptcy laws" or a disposition of property forbidden by law. But although the alienation could not take effect so as to disappoint and delay the creditors in the first bankruptcy, it operated as against the settlor as a forfeiture. He lost all his rights to the residue left after paying those creditors. The income came under the control and discretion of the trustees. If the limitation over had been to a determined person (as to the wife in Re Detmold, ubi sup.), she would have claimed a vested interest, which could only have been divested by impeaching the settlement—an impeachment which in this case has failed. The case looks different because the trustees of the settlement have a discretionary power; but the law to be applied is the same.

Appeal allowed.

Re REIS; Ex parte THE TRUSTEE. (a)

Bankruptcy — Marriage settlement — Husband's covenant to settle all after-acquired property except business assets—Act of bankruptcy—Subsequent transfer of property to the trustees of the settlement—Title of trustee in bankruptcy—Meaning of "becoming bankrupt"—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 47 (2).

By his marriage settlement, executed in 1879, the debtor covenanted to settle all after-acquired property, both real and personal, except business assets. In 1891 he was very successful, and purchased a house and furniture for 17,000*l.*, in which he lived with his wife and family. Early in 1903 he was in financial difficulties, and on the 23rd May the trustees of the settlement served a written notice requiring him to transfer the house and furniture. On the 26th May the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy, and on the 10th June he conveyed the house and furniture to the trustees by two deeds. On the 15th July the receiving order was made on an act of bankruptcy committed after the 10th June, and on the 23rd July the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt.

Held, that the words "becoming bankrupt" in sect. 47 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 must be construed by the light of sect. 43 of that Act, and mean the commission of an act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order is made, or, if more than one act of bankruptcy has been committed, the first act of bankruptcy proved to have been committed within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, and that, as the house and furniture had not been actually transferred to the trustees of the marriage settlement before the 26th May, the transfer on the 10th June was void against the trustees in bankruptcy.

MOTION by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a transfer of property by the debtor to the trustees of his marriage settlement.

The settlement was executed in 1879, and contained a covenant by the debtor to settle all after-acquired property, both real and personal, except business assets.

In 1901 the debtor, who had established himself in business as an "outside" stockbroker, was very successful, and his profits exceeded 50,000*l.* In that year he purchased a freehold house, in which he subsequently lived, the cost of the house and its furniture being 17,000*l.*

In the early part of 1903 he became involved in difficulties, his creditors being practically all stockbrokers.

On the 23rd May the trustees of his marriage settlement served on him a written notice requiring him to transfer his house, &c., to them.

On the 26th May he committed an act of bankruptcy by giving notice of an intention to suspend payment.

On the 10th June by two deeds he transferred the freehold house and furniture to the trustees of his marriage settlement.

On the 15th July a receiving order was made on another act of bankruptcy committed on the 29th June.

On the 23rd July he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

The Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52) enacts as follows:

Sect. 43. The bankruptcy of a debtor, whether the same takes place on the debtor's own petition or upon that of a creditor or creditors, shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or, if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition; but no bankruptcy petition, receiving order, or adjudication shall be rendered invalid by reason of any act of bankruptcy anterior to the debt of the petitioning creditor.

Sect. 47 (2). Any covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage, for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife, shall, on his becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

H. Reed, K.C., A. J. David, and Adler for the trustee in bankruptcy.—The debtor having committed an act of bankruptcy on the 26th May, and the receiving order having been made on the 15th July, the title of the trustee in bankruptcy relates back to the 26th May. The debtor became bankrupt, within the meaning of sect. 47 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, on the 26th May, before the property was "actually transferred" in pursuance of the contract contained in the marriage settlement.

Horridge, K.C. and Muir Mackenzie for the trustees of the marriage settlement.—The bankrupt did not "become bankrupt" before the 10th June. The words in sect. 47 are not "commencement of the bankruptcy" as they would have been if an act of bankruptcy had been intended. A man does not "become bankrupt" when he commits an act of bankruptcy; he does not become bankrupt until an order of adjudication is made. Even a receiving order may be rescinded, and a debtor, even after a receiving order has been made against him, may not become bankrupt within the meaning of this section. The furniture had been transferred before the 26th May. It was purchased by the debtor and brought by him into the house of his matrimonial domicile, and that constituted as effectual a transfer as was possible under the circumstances. The possession of chattels by a wife in her husband's house is as good as absolute possession anywhere else. When they ought to be in the wife's possession, the law will attribute the possession to her:

Re Satterthwaite, 2 Man. 52;

Ramsay v. Margrett, 70 L. T. Rep. 788; (1894) 2 Q. B. 18.

H. Reed, K.C. replied.

Hansell and Romer Macklin appeared for Mrs Reis, but took no part in the arguments.

WRIGHT, J.—On the 26th May there was an act of bankruptcy, and on the 10th June the debtor transferred to the trustees of his marriage settlement the after-acquired property which he had covenanted by his marriage settlement to transfer. There was another act of bankruptcy after the 10th June, on which a receiving order was made on the 15th July. The bankruptcy therefore relates back to the 26th May. Then sect. 47 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 enacts: [His Lordship read the sub-section.] On the construction of those words, the first question is, What is the meaning of "becoming bankrupt"? There is, apparently, no authority to guide me on that. Strong reasons have been urged for the view that "commencement of the bankruptcy" would have been used if that had been meant. On the other hand, it is said that "adjudicated bankrupt" would have been more natural than "becoming bankrupt" if that had been meant. It seems to me, however, that I ought to construe the words "becoming bankrupt" by the light of sect. 43. That section says, reading only the material words: "The bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed . . . to commence at . . . the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition." If the bankruptcy is to be deemed to have commenced, then, as from the date it is deemed to have commenced, I should say the bankrupt must be deemed to be a bankrupt. I am quite alive to the possibility that the view I am taking is wrong, but I think I ought to take that view. Then there comes the second question, What is the proper meaning of the words "becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant"? It has been argued with great force that various kinds of constructive transfers are enough. It seems to me that the very object of the language used is to exclude all such arguments, and that it means what it says—viz., that the sub-section is to apply unless there has been an actual legal transfer pursuant to the contract or covenant. The cases of Ramsay v. Margrett and Re Satterthwaite (ubi sup.) appear to me to be quite different. In Ramsay v. Margrett there had been an actual verbal sale and payment of the consideration. In Satterthwaite's case the house, together with the furniture in it, had been actually assigned to trustees for the wife, and under those circumstances it was held that possession, which might on the face of it be ambiguous, must follow the title. Both those cases were decided on the Bills of Sale Acts. In this case there was no actual transfer till the 10th June. In my judgment sect. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 cannot be construed with reference to the Bills of Sale Act, and, the transfer having been subsequent to the 26th May, the transfer is not good within the sub-section. Then it remains only to ask whether sect. 47, if I have rightly held it applicable, is in any way subject to or modified by sect. 49. This point has not been really argued, and I do not think it could be properly argued. Sect. 49 appears on its face and by its terms only to apply when sect. 47 does not apply, and further, the enumeration of the cases to which sect. 49 is to be applicable does not include any description which is properly applicable to what took place when this property was transferred to the trustees. The transfer to the trustees was not a payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; it was not a payment or delivery to the bankrupt; it was not a conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; and it was not a contract or dealing by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration. Therefore sect. 49 has no application.

A judgment summons was issued in the County Court on a final judgment in the High Court, and on the 17th Oct. 1903 a bankruptcy notice was served, which was not complied with.

On the 2nd Nov. an order to pay by instalments was made on the judgment summons.

On the 3rd Nov. a bankruptcy petition was presented by another creditor, founded on the non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice.

Held, that the petitioning creditor was entitled to a receiving order, the debtor having committed an act of bankruptcy before the making of the order on the judgment summons, which any creditor could take advantage of.

Montgomery v. De Bulmes (78 L. T. Rep. 671; (1898) 2 Q. B. 420) distinguished.

APPEAL by the petitioning creditors from the decision of the registrar of the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Leeds, dismissing a petition.

On the 21st Sept. 1903 the Leeds Patent Brick Company obtained final judgment against the debtor in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice for 43l. 10s. 3d.

On the 25th Sept. a judgment summons was issued in the Leeds County Court on the judgment of the 21st Sept., and on the 13th Oct. a bankruptcy notice was issued by the Leeds Patent Brick Company, which was served on the 17th Oct.

On the 2nd Nov. the judgment summons was heard at the Leeds County Court, and an order was made to pay the debt by monthly instalments of 1l.

On the 3rd Nov. a bankruptcy petition was presented by the Rock Red Brick Company, founded on a non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice served on the 17th Oct. This petition was heard on the 27th Nov., and was dismissed.

Ringwood in support of the appeal.—The decision of the registrar was based on Jones v. Jenner (25 L. J. 319, Ex.) and Montgomery v. De Bulmes (78 L. T. Rep. 671; (1898) 2 Q. B. 420), but neither of those cases apply to the facts here. The procedure under the Debtors Act 1869 is merely punitive, and does not amount to an execution:

Stonor v. Fowls, 58 L. T. Rep. 1; 13 App. Cas. 20;
Re Watson; Ex parte Johnstone, 67 L. T. Rep. 519; (1893) 1 Q. B. 21.

The proceedings on the judgment summons did not constitute a stay.

Hansell for the debtor.—The petition was rightly dismissed. The question for decision is whether after a judgment creditor has elected to take proceedings under the Debtors Act, and an order to pay by instalments has been made, on which there has been no default, the creditor can afterwards turn round and issue execution, or do what amounts to issuing execution, commence bankruptcy proceedings by the issue of a bankruptcy notice. The County Court Rules prevent a creditor who has taken proceedings by judgment summons from issuing execution. [He referred to Order XXV., rr. 17, 25, 26, and 27, of the County Court Rules of 1889.] The High Court is for the purpose of a judgment summons under the County Court Rules, and under those rules a judgment of the High Court when enforced by judgment summons is on the same footing as a judgment in one County Court enforced by judgment in another County Court. The case of Montgomery v. De Bulmes (ubi sup.) is a binding authority in my favour.

Ringwood, in reply, referred to Church's Trustees v. Montague Hibbard and Co., 87 L. T. Rep. 412; (1902) 2 Ch. 784.

The act of bankruptcy relied on by the petitioning creditors was the non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice served on the 17th Oct., and, as more than seven days had elapsed before the 2nd Nov., when the order was made on the judgment summons, there was an act of bankruptcy on which any creditor could found a petition.

WRIGHT, J.—I think this receiving order was wrongly refused by the registrar. The ground on which I base my decision is that before the making of the order to pay the judgment debt by instalments on the 2nd Nov. the debtor had committed a complete act of bankruptcy. That being so, any creditor was entitled to take advantage of that act of bankruptcy and to found a petition on it, even if the debtor had paid the whole of the debt. Apart from that fact, I think there is great force in the arguments of Mr. Hansell, and it seems to me that on the authority of Montgomery v. De Bulmes (ubi sup.) this petition might have been properly dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. The decision in this case seems to me to follow from the words of sect. 4 (1) (8) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, which provides that "a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him a bankruptcy notice . . . under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment . . . and he does not within seven days after service of the notice . . . comply with the requirements of the notice." Apart from the commission of an act of bankruptcy, I also think that there is great force in the contention that pro-

Bankruptcy—Execution—Payment to creditor—Withdrawal by sheriff—Bankruptcy of debtor—Completion of execution—Title of trustee—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45—Bankruptcy Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11.

On the 22nd July 1903 the sheriff levied on the goods of the debtor at the Alexandra and Adelphi Hotels. On the 27th July he withdrew, on the instructions of the judgment creditor, from the Alexandra Hotel on part payment.

On the 28th July the debtor sold to the execution creditor goods at the Alexandra Hotel which had been seized, and on the 29th July he also sold to the execution creditor goods at the same place which had not been seized. On the same day an arrangement was made by which the debtor received credit for the amount in the hands of the sheriff and for the goods sold, and he paid the balance direct to the execution creditor.

The sheriff withdrew, and on the 12th Aug. he paid over the amount in his hands to the execution creditor, having received no notice of a bankruptcy petition.

On the 20th Aug. a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition.

Held, that the trustee in bankruptcy had no title against the execution creditor to the money or the goods.

APPEAL by the trustee in bankruptcy from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Glamorganshire holden at Swansea, dismissing his application for a declaration that certain cash and goods received by an execution creditor formed part of the bankrupt's estate, on the ground that the execution had not been completed before the date of the receiving order.

On the 22nd July 1903 an execution for 157l. 13s. 9d. was levied by the sheriff on the goods of the debtor situated at the Alexandra and Adelphi Hotels at Swansea.

On the 27th July the judgment creditor authorised the sheriff to withdraw from the Alexandra Hotel on payment of 20l., and he accordingly withdrew.

On the 28th July the sheriff was authorised to delay the sale of the goods seized at the Adelphi Hotel in view of the possibility of a settlement. On that day the debtor sold to the execution creditor a cash till for 25l. and some beer for 2l. 5s. These goods were at the Alexandra Hotel, and had been seized on the 22nd July under the execution.

On the 29th July the debtor sold to the execution creditor a cask of whisky for 21l. 0s. 6d. The cask of whisky was at the Alexandra Hotel, but it had not been seized under the execution.

In the afternoon of the same day a meeting of the debtor, the judgment creditor, and the sheriff took place when the execution was settled in the following manner: Credit was given by the execution creditor for the amount in the hands of the sheriff, and for the goods sold by the debtor, and the balance was paid in cash direct to the execution creditor. The sheriff withdrew by direction of the execution creditor.

The sheriff held the balance in his hands for fourteen days, and, not having received notice of any bankruptcy petition, on the 12th Aug. he paid it over to the execution creditor, less the costs of the levy.

On the 20th Aug. a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition, and he was adjudicated a bankrupt on the same day.

The Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45, enacts:

(1) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. (2) For the purposes of this Act an execution is completed by seizure and sale.

The Bankruptcy Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71) s. 11, enacts:

(1) Where any goods of a debtor are taken in execution and before sale thereof, or the completion of the execution by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall, on request, deliver the goods and any money seized or recovered in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver, but the costs of the execution shall be a first charge on the goods or money so delivered, and the official receiver or trustee may sell the goods, or an adequate part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying the charge. (2) Where under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding twenty pounds the goods of a debtor are sold or money is paid in order to avoid sale, the sheriff shall deduct his costs of the execution from the proceeds of sale or the money paid, and retain the balance for fourteen days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor and a receiving order is made against the debtor thereon, or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the official receiver or, as the case may be, to the trustee, who shall be entitled to retain the same as against the execution creditor.

Meager, for the trustee in bankruptcy, in support of the appeal.—This execution had not been completed before the date of the receiving order by seizure and sale or payment as required by sect. 45 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 and sect. 11 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890. Here the sheriff only received part of the money paid under the execution; the rest was paid direct to the execution creditor, and the sheriff did not hold the full amount of the levy for fourteen days as required by the Bankruptcy Acts. The case of Re Pollock and Pendle (87 L. T. Rep. 238) is a conclusive authority in favour of my contention.

WRIGHT, J.—In my opinion there is no real question in this case. The case of Re Pollock and Pendle (ubi sup.) is clearly distinguishable, because there the receiving order was made within seven days of the payment of the money, and therefore there is nothing in that case which governs this. Here the sheriff retained the money for the fourteen days as prescribed by the statute, and, not having received notice of any petition against the bankrupt, paid it over to the execution creditor. As to the other items and the cash payment, they are covered by what the court said in Re Ford (ubi sup.). The whole transaction here was completed long before the date of the receiving order.

Re HANBURY; HANBURY v. FISHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Will—Construction—Precatory trust—Gift absolute or on trust—Gift in default of disposition—Repugnancy.

A testator gave, devised, and bequeathed to his wife "the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit; and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be divided among the surviving said nieces."

The testator's wife and seven nieces survived him. Held (by Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J. dissenting), that there was an absolute gift to the widow unaffected by any precatory trust in favour of the nieces, and the words "in default of any disposition," &c., imposed a condition which was repugnant to the previous absolute gift and could not be construed as creating an executory devise or gift over after the absolute gift, and must therefore be rejected.

Per Cozens-Hardy, L.J.: The widow took more than a life interest, and, should all the nieces predecease her, her absolute interest would remain; but the surviving nieces, if any, were sufficiently indicated as the persons to take after her death; and this overriding intention could be given effect to without unduly straining the language of the will.

Decision of Kekewich, J. affirmed.

THE Right Hon. Robert William Hanbury, of Ilam Hall, Staffordshire, formerly President of the Board of Agriculture and M.P. for Preston, who died on the 28th April 1903, leaving a very large property, by his will, which was dated the 31st Oct. 1893 and was in the testator's own handwriting, after a bequest in favour of his sister, made the following bequest:

I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife, Ellen Hanbury, the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit; and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces. I make this will in full confidence that my dear wife will show the affection of a daughter to my dear mother and stepfather.

And, after appointing his wife and Charles Fisher executrix and executor, the testator gave to the said Charles Fisher "such sum, not exceeding 150*l.*, as my dear wife may decide upon."

The testator never had any children.

A summons was taken out by the widow against the other executor and the testator's seven surviving nieces to have it determined whether the plaintiff took absolutely for her own use and benefit, or whether she took for life only, with remainder to such of the nieces as she should by will appoint, or, in default of appointment, to the surviving nieces in equal shares.

The summons was heard by Kekewich, J. on the 10th July 1903, when the following judgment was delivered:—

KEKEWICH, J.—The first question is undoubtedly one of construction. The contention of the nieces, to my mind, is perfectly unsound. Regarding the will for the purpose of construction, one must not bring in all one's knowledge and all the authorities about the use of the word "confidence" or "cestuis que trust," and so forth. In order to find out what the construction of the will is, one must in the first instance find what it means in ordinary language, and it seems to me that, construed in that way, there is, without the slightest doubt, an absolute gift to the wife. There is a gift to her of "the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely." Of course, if there were no more, no one could have any doubt about the meaning. But the testator goes on to say this: "In full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself." I repeat, one must dismiss from one's mind the technical meaning of "confidence" for the purpose of ascertaining in the first instance what the testator meant. I must not remember, or at any rate I must ignore, the fact that the word "confidence" may be used in a technical sense as meaning "use" or "trust." I must regard "confidence" as used or employed in the ordinary sense in which "confidence" is employed among Englishmen speaking their own language. I venture to say that no one could put any meaning upon the word "confidence" standing alone, an English word used by Englishmen without technical knowledge, other than that which Mrs. Hanbury seeks to place on it here. When you confide in persons you trust them, not trust them in the technical sense of making them trustees, but leaving to them the power to do what you wish them to do and being sure that they will fulfil those wishes. The idea of trust is entirely out of the question. That seems to me clear on the use of the word "confidence" alone; but it is enhanced by the words which follow, that the confidence is "that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself." Now, I care not for this purpose whether "it" is, as it certainly is grammatically, the entire property, or whether "it" is only that of which a person in the ordinary case would make use—that is, the income. The confidence is that she will use it as she knows he would have used it, and that she should use it in the way in which he would have used it, leaving it to her in that confidence which exists between the two, and not as defining any particular trust. So far, to my mind, not only is the word "confidence" in favour of Mrs. Hanbury's contention, but the words following support that construction. Now, when you come further on, no doubt you come to difficulties, for the testator continues: "And that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit." He confides in her to do that. If the confidence means what I hold it to mean, that really means nothing more. But still there is, no doubt, an expression of his intention that she will dispose of it in that particular way among his nieces; and that is emphasised again by the gift in default of any disposition by her, which is: "I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces," showing that the nieces were in his thoughts; that the nieces were persons for whom he did not intend to provide, but for whom he wished the wife to provide. It all depends, therefore, whether these words are sufficient to cut down the gift which, according to my construction, is absolute in her favour in the first instance. I have no doubt that the rule which I ventured to lay down in Re Hamilton (72 L. T. Rep. 88; (1895) 1 Ch. 373) is perfectly sound, and I say so with more confidence because, although there are no words in the judgments of the Court of Appeal (72 L. T. Rep. 748; (1895) 2 Ch. 372) actually adopting the language in which I laid down the rule, still I do find expressions which show that the Court of Appeal did not differ from it. But I put aside that, and turn to what Lord St. Leonards said in his work, written in 1849, on the Law of Property, in the passage quoted by Lindley, L.J. in his judgment in Re Williams (76 L. T. Rep. 603; (1897) 2 Ch. 21). It is this (p. 375): "The law as to the operation of words of recommendation, confidence, request, or the like, attached to an absolute gift, has in late times varied from the earlier authorities. In nearly every recent case the gift has been held to be uncontrolled by the request or recommendation made or confidence expressed. This undoubtedly simplifies the law, and it is not an unwholesome rule that, if a testator really means his recommendation to be imperative, he should express his intention in a mandatory form; but this conclusion was not arrived at without a considerable struggle." That rule seems to me to cover this case from the beginning to the end. You have the confidence; you have the absolute gift in the first instance not controlled by the confidence; you have the absence of the mandatory expression of intention which Lord St. Leonards says according to a not unwholesome rule ought to be found before you enforce the trust. It seems to me the cases cited and what I venture to say on the law generally cover the whole case, and that Mrs. Hanbury takes absolutely. It is said there is no case in which there was a gift over—that is to say, a gift in default of the exercise of the power purported to be conferred on the absolute donee—where the precatory trust is not mentioned. That may be so. I have not examined all the cases, but the answer to it, to my mind, is this: Here you have a gift over in these words, "In default of any disposition by her thereof by her will and testament, I hereby direct" that the property shall go among the surviving nieces. Is it right, on the proper construction of the will, to call that a gift over? To my mind it is not. There can be no gift over except in default of the exercise of a power of appointment, which power is valid and exercisable. Now, according to my construction of the will, there is no power of appointment; there is no power which is valid or exercisable. The power which he purports to give of devising it among the nieces at his decease is repugnant to the absolute gift and fails, and there is nothing, therefore, as regards which you can say strictly according to law it is in default of the exercise of the power. That argument, therefore, I think, fails as well as the others. The result is, I must find Mrs. Hanbury to be under this will the donee absolutely for her own benefit of all the testator's real and personal estate and property.

From this decision the nieces appealed.

Warmington, K.C., Vernon Smith, K.C., Christopher James, and M. Romer for the nieces. —Under this will the nieces are intended to have an interest in the property if they survive the wife, either under her will or under the testator's will. No difficulty arises as to what the nieces are to take, and there is a trust in their favour. In Re Bagshaw's Trust (36 L. T. Rep. 749) a gift to a wife absolute in form was held by the Court of Appeal on the whole will to be for life only. In considering whether a precatory trust is attached to any legacy, the court will be guided by the intention of the testator apparent on the will, and not by any particular words in which the wishes of the testator are expressed:

Here the will in fact contains, first, a gift to the wife; secondly, a gift to the nieces; and then it provides that if neither of the nieces survive the wife, then the whole property is to go to the wife. It is contrary to the testator's intention that if his nieces survive his wife they shall get nothing. This is, in fact, a gift to the wife subject to such interest as she may appoint to the nieces; and, failing any such appointment, there is a gift over to the testator's surviving nieces in equal shares. If the general intention of a testator can be collected upon the whole will, particular terms used which are inconsistent with that intention may be rejected as introduced by the testator's mistake or ignorance of the force of the words used; and where the latter part of a will is inconsistent with a prior part, the latter part will prevail:

Sherratt v. Bentley, 2 My. & K. 149.

[WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Williams on Executors, 9th edit., vol. 2, p. 934.]

Haldane, K.C., Warrington, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell for Mrs. Hanbury.—Reading the whole of the will, it shows the intention of the testator was to put his wife in his place, and to give her an unfettered discretion as to what she would do with the property, but at the same time he expressed a wish that she would give some benefit to his nieces. It is an absolute devise and bequest to his wife, and the expressions of the testator's confidence are not intended to impose any trust on her. The final direction in default of any disposition by the will of his wife is repugnant to the previous absolute gift, and therefore must be rejected altogether:

Holmes v. Godson, 8 D. M. & G. 152, 159.

L. W. Byrne for the executors.

Vernon Smith in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 2.—WILLIAMS, L.J.—I will, for the purposes of my judgment, first assume that the words in this will following the words "in full confidence" do not, having regard to recent decisions, constitute a trust in favour of the nieces. Now, if that is so, the main question which we have to decide is whether the words "and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces" impose a condition which is repugnant to the previous absolute gift, or whether those words should be construed as creating an executory devise or gift over after an absolute gift. Now, in the first place, if you read the words from "I give and bequeath" down to the word "absolutely" and omit the words from "in full confidence" down to but exclusive of the words "and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will and testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces," it seems to me impossible to construe those words as creating an executory devise or gift over, or otherwise than as repugnant to the absolute gift and devise to the wife. It was argued that if one takes into consideration the words "in full confidence that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit," this justifies us in reading the words "in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will and testament" as if the words were "in default of any such disposition," and it is said, if one does this, that the direction "in default of such disposition" really constituted a devise or gift over in favour of the nieces who shall survive the widow. In the first place, the words are not "any such disposition," and in my opinion it cannot be said that there is anything in the will which renders it necessary to interpolate that word except the fact that the words of the will, read as they stand, contain a direction inconsistent with the law founded on principles of public policy, which says that, in the event of an owner in fee dying intestate, the estate shall go to his heir, and in the case of personal property to his next of kin; or, to put it shortly, contains a direction which defeats the course of devolution which the law provides as the incident of an absolute interest. My observation is, of course, quite apart from the question whether the words of this will, taken as a whole, create a trust binding on the conscience of the widow as owner in fee of the realty or absolute owner of the personalty. The case of Holmes v. Godson (ubi sup.), and in particular the judgment of Turner, L.J., seems to me, properly applied, to govern this case, and to justify thus far my conclusion. Now, is there a trust in favour of the nieces? The law appears to me now to be this, that a gift followed by such expressions as "in full confidence" will not by mere force of the words create a trust; you must take the will which you have to construe and see what it means—see, that is, what was the intention of the testator as expressed in his will—and answer the question aye or no according to the intention of the testator as expressed by his will. I will first deal with the considerations arising on the will which favour the trust, and then with the words which go to negative it. The words "in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself" favour a trust because they suggest that the wife is not to dispose of the corpus, but to keep it till her death; but this is a very lame mode of expressing that which is really inconsistent with the ordinary use of the word "absolutely," which prima facie in a will means unfettered in respect of any condition or trust. Next we have the words "I hereby direct," which are certainly consistent with a trust, but, it may be observed, are inconsistent with the word "absolutely." Lastly, there is the bequest, "I give to Charles Fisher such sum, not exceeding 150*l.*, as my dear wife may decide upon." This can hardly be said to favour a trust otherwise than in the sense that it goes to negative the absolute property of the widow, but I cannot think there is really anything in this point, especially as the sentence, taken as a whole, is evidence of the wish of the testator that his wife's discretion should control everything. I think I ought to add in favour of the trust that there does not seem to me to be any uncertainty of fund or object. On the other hand, the word "absolutely" certainly goes to negative a trust imperative on the widow, and the words "in full confidence," in immediate collocation with the word "absolutely" go to emphasise that word almost as strongly as if the words had been "in full confidence nevertheless that my very dear wife will use the property as I should have done." I cannot easily bring myself to the conclusion that this form of words would be used by anyone who at the same time intended to impose any obligation on his wife. Again, the words "in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament" seem to me unnatural if

Re HANBURY; HANBURY v. FISHER.

a trust was intended, although they are not so absolutely inconsistent with a trust as they would have been if the words had been "any disposition," omitting "by her will or testament." Then the testator directs that "all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall be divided," &c., which looks very like an attempt by the testator to control the disposition of property which he had intended she should absolutely acquire under his will. Again he uses in the clause relating to the personal relations of his widow with his mother the words "in full confidence" when he obviously could not have intended to create a trust. Then there is the general form of the will, which seems to me to exclude any intention by the testator to bind his wife by imperative obligations. In the case of the money which he bequeathed for the benefit of his sister, where he did intend an imperative obligation, he carefully excluded that money from the property to go to his wife absolutely. On the whole, I think there is no trust and no executory devise or gift over, but merely a forgetfulness by a testator, who intended to give an unfettered absolute property, of the rule of law which prevents him when he has made such a gift from controlling the subsequent devolution of the property thus acquired by his gift. I think I ought to add that I have considered that part of the argument in which it was contended that, according to the true construction of this will, the wife was to take a life estate with a special power of appointment by will, and I do not think that contention can be supported. The result is that the judgment of Kekewich, J. will be affirmed.

STIELING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and substantially for the same reasons; but, having regard to the difference of opinion which unfortunately exists in the court, I think it is right that I should state in my own way the reasoning which has brought me to take the view which I have just expressed. Now, we have here to deal with a will which is the workmanship, as I understand, of the testator himself, or, at all events, of someone who is not skilled in the law, and certainly it is expressed in such a way as to give occasion to great difficulty in ascertaining the real meaning of the testator. He begins with a disposition which is absolutely clear if it stood by itself: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife, Ellen Hanbury, the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely," but later on there are strong words which appear to indicate an intention on the part of the testator that in certain events the property so given to the widow absolutely should go over in favour of his surviving nieces. He says in a certain event, which I shall speak of in a moment, "I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces"; and to my mind the real question which we have to deal with is, What is the event on which that gift over was to take place? Now, it was admitted by counsel for the appellants that if the will had run thus: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife, Ellen Hanbury, the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely," and if that had been followed by these words, "and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament I hereby direct," and so forth, that the gift in default of any disposition by the wife of the property by her will or testament would be repugnant and void in law. I think that this admission was well founded, and is in accordance with the law laid down in Holmes v. Godson (ubi sup.). It was admitted, on the other hand, by counsel for the respondent that if the will had run thus: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife, Ellen Hanbury, the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, and, if any one or more of my nieces shall survive my said wife, then at her death to such one or more of them as she shall by will select, or in default of such selection to all my said surviving nieces in equal shares," the gift over in favour of the surviving nieces would have been perfectly good, and would have taken effect by way of executory devise and bequest in the event of any nieces surviving. An example of such a gift is to be found in Crozier v. Crozier (L. Rep. 15 Eq. 282). Now, the argument for the appellants consisted substantially in an endeavour to bring the case under the last category to which I have referred. They are, however, met with this great difficulty, that the event in which the testator has in terms said that the property acquired by his wife is to go over is not the event of any of the nieces surviving his widow, but that of his widow failing to make any testamentary disposition. To escape from this difficulty it was said that the will must be read as a whole, and that consideration must be given to the clause which up to this point I have not taken any notice of—namely, "in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit." Unquestionably the whole will must be read together, and that clause must be taken into consideration. It was then contended that, this being done, the will ought to be read as if the word "such" had been inserted before the word "disposition," so that the gift would take effect only in the event of the testator's widow failing to dispose of his property by will in favour of one or more of the surviving nieces. I confess that during the argument I was much impressed by this contention, and, if I thought that this really expressed the intention of the testator, I should have been very willing to give effect to it. But, after careful consideration, I cannot find enough in this will to enable me so to hold. The insertion of the word "such" appears to me to entirely alter the complexion of the will, and to afford an indication that the testator's intention was that the widow should not be at liberty to make a testamentary disposition of his property except in favour of one or more of the surviving nieces. Reading the will as it stands, and by the light of the views taken by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Re Williams (ubi sup.) as to the effect to be given to such expressions as "in full confidence," I am unable to find that the testator has given such an indication. It appears to me that all that the testator intended to do was to provide against the possible intestacy on the part of the widow, and that he has in this respect committed a mistake as to the law, which is not infrequently found in the testamentary disposition of persons who prepare their own wills. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

Re GEIPEL'S PATENT.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — This case affords a striking instance of the difficulty of construing a will drawn by a layman, although at the first glance the language used seems clear and free from ambiguity. The testator was a man of large property, real and personal. He left a widow, but he had no child. Among his nearest relations were his nieces. It is apparent that he was minded to benefit his wife, in whom he had "full confidence." It is equally apparent that he desired that such of his nieces as should survive his wife should, directly or indirectly, derive benefits under his will. Now, it is contended on the part of the widow that the gift to her is absolute and free from any trust, condition, or gift over, and that, in so far as the testator has expressed a "confidence" that she will devise her absolute property in a particular way, no binding effect can be attributed to it, and that the final direction in the event of her not making any disposition thereof by will is repugnant and void: (Holmes v. Godson, ubi sup.). On the part of the nieces it is contended that there is a clear gift on the widow's death in favour of the surviving nieces equally, subject to a power of appointment by will given to the widow enabling her to distribute the property between the nieces in different proportions. Upon the whole, I think the widow's contention cannot prevail. I do not doubt that she takes more than a life interest. Should all the nieces predecease her, her absolute interest will remain. But the surviving nieces, if any, are sufficiently indicated as the persons to take after her death. This overriding intention can be given effect to without unduly straining the language. There are several points which tend to support this view. In the first place, the testator seems to have contemplated that, although his widow would "use" the property, it would remain intact at her death. In saying this, I, of course, do not refer to things quæ usu consumuntur. Use and enjoyment, as distinct from disposition of the capital, is what the testator's words indicate. This alone would not suffice to cut down or destroy her prima facie title as absolute owner, but it cannot be wholly disregarded. In the second place, the words "that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit" do not necessarily import a disposition by her of her own property, but may well be read as an appointment by her of his property. No technical words are required for either the creation or the exercise of a power, if the intention is clear. In the third place, the words "in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will" seem from the context necessarily to require the insertion of the word "such" before "disposition." Indeed, this was not seriously disputed by counsel for the respondents. In the fourth place, there is the positive direction that, in the event of what I have called the special power of appointment not being exercised by the wife, all the property shall be equally divided among the nieces. You are not left, as frequently happens, to imply a gift; or to hold that the wife is bound to make an appointment. This express gift is the most distinguishing feature of the case. Lastly, I attach some slight importance to the final legacy to Charles Fisher of "such sum, not exceeding 150*l.*, as my dear wife may decide upon." If she was the sole and absolute owner of the whole property, why this limit of 150*l.*? If the other view is adopted, there is an intelligible reason for the form of this bequest. Not more than 150*l.* is to be taken away from the capital to which the nieces may become entitled. The result is that, though not without considerable doubt, I do not find myself able to agree with the judgment of Kekewich, J., or with the judgments of Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.

Re GEIPEL'S PATENT. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Patent action — Petition for revocation — Liberty to apply for leave to amend by disclaimer — Conditions as to infringement prior to order — Discretion of judge — Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18, 19, 20.

Where a patent is ordered to be revoked unless within a certain time the patentee obtains leave to amend by disclaimer, the judge has a discretion as to the terms on which he will give the patentee the opportunity of obtaining the leave to amend, and such discretion will only be reviewed by the Court of Appeal in exceptional cases.

Decision of Buckley, J. on this point (89 L. T. Rep. 127) affirmed.

The patent was granted in 1893 for improvements in steam traps, which are devices for the removal from steam pipes or cylinders of water arising from the condensation of the steam.

Buckley, J. came to the conclusion that the provisional specification claimed as the essence of the invention the principle of differential expansion; but fig. 2 in the plan annexed to the complete specification had been proved to be unworkable and useless; and that fig. 6 was based on an entirely different principle, that of controlled expansion, and was therefore bad for disconformity. He accordingly held that figs. 2 and 6 must be disclaimed, but that, subject to such disclaimer, there was a good patent for an invention founded on the principle of differential expansion. He accordingly made an order for revocation unless the patentee should within a certain period obtain leave to amend the specification by disclaimer, but on the terms that, if the specification was amended, no injunction should be asked in any action brought for infringement of the patent in respect of any articles made prior to the date of the order, unless the patentee established "to the satisfaction of the court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge," as provided in sect. 20 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883.

The patentee appealed from the decision so far as it referred to fig. 6, and there was a cross-appeal by the petitioner, who contended that the patentee ought to be absolutely restrained from suing in respect of any article made prior to the order, as in Deeley v. Perks (75 L. T. Rep. 233; (1896) A. C. 496).

The cross-appeal only calls for a report.

T. Terrell, K.C., Astbury, K.C., and J. H. Gray for the petitioners.—The patentee, as a condition of being allowed to disclaim the bad parts of his patent, should be put on terms not to sue in respect of any articles whatever made prior to the order. The proviso in the words of sect. 20 of the Act of 1883 ought to be omitted. Under sect. 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883 the court has full power to impose any terms:

Deeley v. Perks, 75 L. T. Rep. 233; (1896) A. C. 496;

It would not be fair or just that articles which were manufactured or sold in reliance on the invalidity of a patent which has now been declared to be bad and revocable should be exposed to attack, when as an indulgence the patentee has been allowed to amend his patent by disclaimer. The goods were rightly and legally manufactured. Sect. 20 restricts the recovery of damages where disclaimer is allowed to cases of use of the invention after the disclaimer "unless the patentee establishes to the satisfaction of the court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge," and only applies to cases of amendment under sect. 18 on the application of the patentee. It does not refer to a case where the patent is revoked on a hostile petition. Here the claim was not framed with reasonable skill and knowledge, as fig. 2 could not work. Buckley, J. has based his judgment on wrong principles.

Bousfield, K.C. and A. J. Walter.—The petitioners obtain the fullest protection under the order of Buckley, J. They have all the rights given to them by sect. 20, and, in order to obtain any damages, the patentee will have to establish to the satisfaction of the court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge. In the cases referred to there were exceptional circumstances, and in all of them the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords upheld the discretion of the judge. The judge who hears the case is best acquainted with the proper order to make. Where there are no special circumstances, no special order should be made, and the case should be dealt with under the provisions of sect. 20. It was intended by that section that a patentee should be able to obtain damages if he could show that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge.

Astbury, K.C. in reply.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—We all agree that the judge has a discretion in the matter, not merely a limited discretion as suggested. The judge knows much more about the case than we do, and he has exercised that discretion, and I do not think we ought to review it. Under those circumstances, I think perhaps the best way will be to abstain from making any observation upon the arguments which were put forward at the Bar, whether I agree with them or whether I do not. I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is not for me to say whether I should have exercised the discretion in the same way as the learned judge, but, he having exercised it, I cannot say that he has gone so wrong that we ought to review it.

[The court reserved judgment on the other point, and on the 8th Feb. delivered judgment, holding that fig. 6 was based on the principle of differential expansion, and there was no conformity between the provisional and complete specification, and reversing the decision of Buckley, J. on this point.]

NORTHAMPTON CORPORATION v. ELLEN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Water—Water supply by corporation—Water for domestic use—"Water rate"—Right of corporation to charge at different rates—"Rate"—Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. cxxiii.), s. 36.

A municipal corporation acquired the undertaking of a waterworks company by a private Act, which authorised the corporation "to charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding 7½ per cent. per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable." The company had statutory power to supply any person with water for any purpose for such remuneration as might be agreed under a special agreement; and the corporation succeeded to that power.

The corporation charged for the supply of water for domestic use in one part of the borough 5 per cent., and in another part 7½ per cent., upon the net rateable value of dwelling-houses.

Held (reversing the judgment of Bigham, J.), that the corporation had power to charge at different rates, within the maximum, for the supply of water for domestic use to dwelling-houses.

A provisional order provided that the general district rates to be levied in a district thereby added to the borough should not in any year for ten years exceed such an amount in the pound as, when added to the poor rate and borough rate "and any other rate made by the corporation" in the same year, would make a total rate of 5s. 6d. in the pound.

Held (affirming the decision of Bigham, J.), that the water rate was not a "rate" within the meaning of the words "any other rate" in the provisional order.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. upon a special case stated in the action by consent of the parties.

NORTHAMPTON CORPORATION v. ELLEN.

[CT. OF APP.]

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of 1*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*, the amount of a quarterly instalment of a water rate for water supplied for domestic use.

The plaintiffs provided the defendant with a supply of water for domestic use at his dwelling-house at Kingsthorpe.

Kingsthorpe was incorporated with the borough of Northampton by the Northampton (Extension) Order 1900. Before that date it had, since 1861, formed part of the area of water supply.

The sum of 1*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* was made up of a sum of 1*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, a quarter's instalment of an annual rate of 7½ per cent. upon the rateable value of the defendant's house, and 4*s.* 6*d.* for extra charges for a bath and water-closets.

In 1884 the plaintiffs, under the powers conferred on them by sect. 19 of the Northampton Waterworks Act 1882, purchased the undertaking of the Northampton Waterworks Company, which was incorporated by the Northampton Waterworks Act 1861.

The purchase was effected by the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. ccviii.), which provides:

Sect. 10. From and after the transfer of the company's undertaking to the corporation all the rights, powers, authorities, and obligations of the company shall be by virtue of this Act transferred to, vested in, and exercisable by and imposed upon the corporation, and the Act of 1861 and the Act of 1882 shall be read and have effect as if the corporation had been therein named instead of the company.

Sect. 25. If in any year the amount standing to the credit of the water account be insufficient for the payment of the charges thereon and the execution of this Act in relation to the water undertaking, the deficiency shall be made up out of the general district rate.

Sect. 36. Sect. 49 of the Act of 1861 [by which rates varying with different rateable values were authorised] is hereby repealed, and the corporation may charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding seven and a half per centum per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable, or if there be no such list then on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as the same is assessed to the last poor rate.

The Northampton Waterworks Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. xlvii.) provides:

Sect. 59. The company may from time to time supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required, for such remuneration and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person desirous of having such supply of water, under a special agreement.

There was no provision in any of the Acts which gave any specific directions or powers as to either equality or differentiation of water rates.

The defendant had, until the 24th June 1901, always paid in respect of his house a water rate of 7½ per cent. on the net rateable value.

In the year 1900 that part of Kingsthorpe in which the defendant's house was situate was included within the boundaries of the borough of Northampton by the Northampton (Extension) Order 1900, which was confirmed by 63 & 64 Vict. c. clxxxiii.

By that Extension Order (art. 36) it was provided that the general district rates to be levied in Kingsthorpe should not in any one year for a period of ten years, together with the poor rate, the borough rate, and any other rate made by the corporation in the same year, exceed an amount which would make up a total rate of 5*s.* 6*d.* in the pound on the rateable value of any hereditament.

From the commencement of the order the rates (other than the water rates) in Kingsthorpe always amounted to 5*s.* 6*d.* in the pound.

From the commencement of the order until the 24th June 1901 the plaintiffs always demanded a water rate of 7½ per cent. per annum from the defendant and from all other consumers of water for domestic use both in the old borough and in the added districts.

On and after the 24th June 1901 the plaintiffs reduced the water rate from 7½ to 5 per cent. in the case of the domestic consumers within the old borough, but retained the rate of 7½ per cent. in Kingsthorpe and other added districts.

This difference in the water rates was made in pursuance of a resolution as follows:

To reduce the charge of 7½ per cent. upon the rateable value to 5 per cent., the deficiency to be met out of the district rate. As the district rate for this purpose will only be chargeable within the old borough, it is obvious that the reduction ought to apply only to the old borough until such time as the rates on the newly added portion cease to be differential. It is estimated that this reduction will leave a sum of about 3500*l.* to be contributed out of the district rate of the borough.

The plaintiffs stated that they deemed it equitable to effect the reduction because a large amount of property in the borough, which was rateable to the poor and district rates and which benefited by the presence of an adequate public water supply for fire extinguishing and sanitary purposes, did not pay anything towards the cost of the water undertaking, because the owners and occupiers of the property did not in respect of the same take the water supply of the plaintiffs.

As a means of enforcing contribution from such owners and occupiers the plaintiffs adopted the above reduction, so that the owners and occupiers within the old borough would by their contributions to the district rate fund have to make good any deficiency created by the reduction of the water rate.

The plaintiffs contended that they were entitled not to reduce the water rate in the parts newly added to the borough from the 7½ per cent. now levied, because, the ratepayers in those parts being privileged from an increase in the district rate for a period of ten years, those ratepayers would bear no part of the extra burden that might be thrown upon the district rate of the old borough by reason of any deficiency resulting from such reduction.

The defendant contended that the water rate was a "rate" within the meaning of art. 36 of the order, and that, as the other rates payable by him amounted to the maximum of 5*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, the plaintiffs could not recover any sum from him in respect of water rate; and that the plaintiffs were not, in any case, entitled to demand of him a higher rate than that demanded from domestic consumers in the old borough, but were bound to place all domestic consumers in the borough on an equality.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the plaintiffs were entitled to differentiate the water rate; (2) whether the plaintiffs were entitled to demand a water rate of the defendant, within ten years of the commencement of the Extension Order, so long as the rates payable by the defendant, exclusive of water rate, amounted to 5s. 6d. in the pound; (3) whether the plaintiffs were entitled to reduce the water rate for the purpose of creating a deficiency on the before-mentioned grounds.

The special case was argued before Bigham, J., who held that the plaintiffs had no power to differentiate the water rate, but must charge the same rate over the whole borough, and that the water rate was not a "rate" within the meaning of art. 36, and accordingly gave judgment in favour of the defendant: (87 L. T. Rep. 335)

C. A. Russell, K.C. and W. Ryland Adkins for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiffs were bound to charge the same water rate to all consumers of water for domestic purposes throughout the borough. There is no duty imposed by any of the statutes to charge equal water rates to all domestic consumers; there are no equality clauses of any kind. In the absence of any express statutory provision to the contrary, an authority, having power to supply water and to make charges up to a certain maximum limit, may waive a part of that maximum charge in any case; it may in some cases make the maximum charge, and in other cases make a less charge. There must either be a power to charge a different rate in any case or no power at all to do so, and it would be going very far to hold that there is no power to charge a higher rate, within the maximum, in parts of the district in which for some reason or other it may be much more expensive to provide a water supply. This charge made for a supply of water is not a "rate" at all within the proper meaning of that term. It is in reality a charge authorised to be made, and made, by the undertakers for the supply of a commodity to consumers, and there is no good reason why different charges should not be made to different consumers within the authorised maximum. In sect. 3 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) it is provided that the "expression 'water rate' shall include any rent, reward, or payment to be made to the undertakers for a supply of water." That shows that a water rate is not really a "rate" in the ordinary sense, but is merely a payment for something supplied. By sect. 59 of the Northampton Waterworks Act 1861 the water company were authorised "to supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required for such remuneration and upon such terms as may be agreed upon"; and by sect. 10 of the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act 1884 the corporation acquired all the powers and rights of the water company. If, then, the corporation may supply different persons at entirely different charges by agreement, there can be no reason why they should not charge different water rates. The principle of the decision in Hungerford Market Company v. City Steamboat Company (3 E. & E. 365) is applicable to this case. In that case it was held that a company empowered by statute to take tolls in return for a public service is not bound, apart from express enactment, to charge the same tolls to all persons alike, but is at liberty to remit the tolls, or any part of them, to particular persons at its pleasure and discretion. By the private Act in that case the company was empowered to take such tolls, within the prescribed maximum, as should be fixed by the company; and the court held that there was no obligation to exact uniform tolls. The charge for water supplied is the same in principle as the toll charged for a public service, and there can be no greater obligation to make uniform charges in the one case than in the other. What is called a water rate is in no way like a poor rate or similar rates in respect of which all persons liable have to be charged at an equal rate; it is not a rateable division of a whole sum among different persons liable, but is simply a charge made to persons who take a supply of water. [ROMER, L.J. referred to sects. 47 and 80 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847.] The supply of water is a commercial undertaking, and there is, therefore, no reason why the undertakers should be bound to make equal charges to all consumers of water, and not be able to make different charges within the statutory maximum.

H. Ivory, K.C., Lampard, and B. Campion for the respondent.—The judgment of the learned judge upon the main question was correct. There may be very different considerations applicable in the case of a commercial company and in the case of a public authority which has power to charge any deficit arising on its undertaking to the public funds of the district. Treating, however, this public authority as being for this purpose in the same position as a water company, there is an implied enactment that the supply of water to consumers for domestic purposes is to be given and is to be charged for at an equal rate, not exceeding 7½ per cent., to all such consumers. In sect. 36 of the Act of 1884 the words "any dwelling-house" mean all dwelling-houses, and the intention of that section is that the same charge, not exceeding 7½ per cent., is to be made for all dwelling-houses. The contention of the corporation must go as far as saying that they have power to charge at different rates in respect of identically similar houses in the same street, which cannot have been the intention of these statutes. It has never yet been contended that a water authority has power to charge different rates in different areas except where by special provisions that power has been given. This is by statute declared to be a "rate," and a "rate" is something which must be imposed equally upon all persons liable to pay, as in the case of poor rates, district rates, and other similar rates. By sect. 56 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) it is provided that, where a local authority supply water to any premises, they may charge in respect of such supply "a water rate to be assessed on the net annual value of the premises." There a "water rate" must imply that the local authority cannot charge different rates for every house at their discretion. Assuming that for some good reason, such as the greater expense of providing a supply of water, a water authority may charge a higher rate in some districts than in others, yet it cannot be said that in this case there was any good reason at all. The corporation cannot have power to deliberately charge in the old part of the borough a rate below the maximum for the purpose of creating a deficiency in the water fund to be made up out of the general district fund. The imposition of a higher water rate in this district than in the old part of the borough is contrary to the intention of art. 36 of the Extension Order. It is a breach of the provision that the total rates in this district are not to exceed 5s. 6d. in the pound. By creating a deficiency in the water fund, which is to be a burden upon the district rate, the corporation deprive the ratepayers of this district of the chance of getting their district rate reduced.

NORTHAMPTON CORPORATION v. ELLEN.

Russell, K.C. in reply.—Sect. 36 of the Act of 1884 was enacted by reason of the then recent decision in Dobbs v. Grand Junction Waterworks Company (49 L. T. Rep. 541; 9 App. Cas. 49), and was not intended to impose any obligation upon the corporation to make equal charges in all parts of their district.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—There is no doubt about the very great importance of the point raised in this case. If the judgment of Bigham, J. is to stand upon the main point, I understand it to be a simple and clear judgment that, by virtue of the provisions of sect. 36 of the local Act of 1884 and any other statutory provisions applicable to this corporation, there is no power to differentiate between different persons who pay for a supply of water. That is a decision of very great importance. The point is one which from time to time to my knowledge has been suggested during the last twenty years, but, as far as I know, never has before received judicial sanction, at any rate in the way that Bigham, J. has decided. I was very anxious indeed to ascertain whether or not there were any other reasons given in that judgment founded upon any of the considerations that have been urged before us by Mr. Avory, because of course there is a great deal to be said prima facie for equality of charges in respect of the supply of such things as the public supply of water, in the same way as in the case of charges authorised in a number of provisions in Acts of Parliament relating to the supply of other sorts of commodities. But I have come to a very clear conclusion that that particular defence raised by this defendant is not open to him, and that, so far as the questions have been argued in order to show that there is an answer to this claim, unless the judgment of Bigham, J. can stand, that there should be equality in charge, the other defences ought not to be raised by the defendant. I think it will be convenient if I briefly state what I understand the point to be, and then refer shortly to the arguments which have been very clearly and ably urged before us. The action was brought to recover 11. 4s. 9d., of which 11. 0s. 3d. was made up by one quarter's instalment of an annual rate at 7½ per cent. upon the rateable value of 54l. Now, there is no question raised by the defendant that the sum claimed is not a proper calculation upon 54l. at 7½ per cent. and is within the maximum power which is given to the company by sect. 36. On the contrary, so far does the defendant press the point, that he says not only that he must pay at 7½ per cent., but that, everybody else must pay at 7½ per cent., and that, if the corporation do not charge everybody else at 7½ per cent., they cannot recover the 7½ per cent. against him.

I do not think he went so far as to say that they cannot recover anything against him, because this case, I presume, has been argued on the basis that he would be willing to pay the 5 per cent., but not the 7½ per cent. Under these circumstances, Mr. Avory says, first of all, that at any rate a corporation cannot, if they are simply relying upon their power to charge under such statutory powers as these, charge anything except an equal rate, or at an equal rate or percentage, all the persons who have not made an agreement with them; and, further, he raises this point, that, by virtue of the provisional order which added Kingsthorpe to Northampton, the total rates in Kingsthorpe were for a period of ten years not to exceed 5s. 6d. in the pound. Now, Mr. Avory has said that the effect of only charging 5 per cent. in the old borough of Northampton would be that there will be a larger charge come upon the general district rate of the borough of Northampton in respect of the water undertaking than there would have been if an equal rate of 7½ per cent. all round had been charged upon all the consumers in Northampton, and therefore, that being so, the effect will be that, there being a larger charge upon the general district rate, there is a greater probability of the 5s. 6d. being maintained, or at any rate that the inhabitants of Kingsthorpe do not get the opportunity, or prospect, or chance of the rates going below the 5s. 6d. For reasons which seem to me to be important, I propose to take that part of the case first, because it is not the most important point in the case, and it is not really the ground upon which Bigham, J. has proceeded. I am at present wholly unable to see how that question can possibly be raised in this action. I have already pointed out that the defendant does not deny that the charge made upon him is prima facie a lawful charge; but he says that the corporation have no right to reduce the rates upon the people who live in the old borough of Northampton, and he suggests that the reasons stated in the case as the justification given by the plaintiffs for the course of action they have adopted in reducing the water rate in the old borough of Northampton to 5 per cent. are not good grounds, and that they ought to have acted differently. All I can say is this, that it seems to me that, in such a proceeding as this, the defendant, unless he can make good the main proposition which Bigham, J. has decided in his favour, is not entitled, in answer to a claim for a specific sum of money otherwise lawful, to put himself in the position of a ratepayer who is alleging that the conduct of the corporation is ultra vires and not in accordance with the Act. I do not want to say more about this point except this, that I see a very great deal of difficulty in any single individual raising it. It may be that a ratepayer who is liable to the district rate may have the right to bring the corporation before some competent court, either with the assistance of the Attorney-General or in some other form of proceedings; it may be that there are proceedings contemplated by the Municipal Corporations Acts, which have sometimes been made available for the purpose of raising such a question as this, in which proceedings it may be that the right of the corporation to reduce the rates of the waterworks undertaking, in order that the consequences may follow which they seem to wish—that is, that there may be a greater equalisation of the payment of the total burthen—may be questioned. I am, however, clearly of opinion that, apart from the ground upon which Bigham, J. proceeded, the question cannot be raised in this action in order to cut down the right of the corporation to make the charge in this case which they have now made. Now, that brings me back to what is the real and very important point in this case, whether the company and then the corporation could or could not differentiate between the charges for water, so that it may be contended that if, in the absence of agreement, they are suing a man for a water rate, the fact that they have in some circumstances charged less to other people makes the whole charge bad. The absence of any equality clause in the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 has been the subject of comment on many occasions. I think that the case of Hungerford Market Company v. City Steamboat Company (3 E. & E. 365) is a very important authority for the view that it is necessary to find, either by Act of Parliament or at common law, some obligations upon the company to have uniform dealings with all the persons with whom they deal. It does not go further than that, because, as has been suggested more than once, one may find such an obligation implied in the way in which the statute had been framed, from the nature of the charge which is being imposed. With regard to the position of the former company, I do not wish to deal summarily with a point which is a very serious point. There are a number of sections in the Act of 1861 enabling the company to make contracts of all kinds with respect to all the purposes for which they supply water, and it is sufficient for my purpose to say that sect. 59 provides that "the company may from time to time supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required, for such remuneration and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person desirous of having such supply of water, under a special agreement." That gives absolute power to the company to make special bargains. It seems to me that, if a person is minded to make a bargain with the company, and a bargain is made, the result and effect of which may be that he pays less for his water, even for domestic purposes, than a person who does not choose to make a bargain, then, unless Mr. Avory is in a position to say that, because a bargain is made with a person by which he will get his water cheaper than another person, therefore the rate upon that other is bad, the fact that the company may make these agreements destroys to a large extent the foundation upon which Mr. Avory's argument rests. Then, in 1884, this waterworks undertaking was transferred to the Northampton Corporation. The transfer of waterworks undertakings to corporations is no new thing, nor is it any necessary part of the ordinary duties of a corporation. The corporation have had these waterworks transferred to them for a public benefit. In many cases, I will not say invariably, because I do not pretend to know, they are put under exactly the same obligations as this corporation were put. Under sects. 24 and 25 the corporation have still got to keep separate waterworks accounts. The waterworks undertaking is quite separate in their hands, subject to this, that there is the security of the district and the borough rates behind for any deficiency which may arise in the course of carrying on the undertaking. I need not refer to the provisions as to working expenses, payment of rentcharges, payment of interest on mortgage debt, payment of interest on debentures, and providing a sinking fund. It becomes the corporation waterworks as distinguished from the company's waterworks. Now, has the power of making agreements been taken away from them? It seems to me that sect. 10 of the Act of 1884 shows that all the powers of the waterworks company are transferred; that the powers are to be such as if the corporation had been named in the general provisions which carry over to the corporation the powers and obligations of the water company, putting them in exactly the same position as the company was in, so far as their right of dealing with customers is concerned. Now, it has been said that sect. 36 of the Act of 1884 has repealed sect. 49 of the Act of 1861, and has imported an obligation to charge everybody alike, and that if they do not charge everybody alike a charge made is bad. I am unable to take that view. I think the only effect of sect. 36 was to alter the standards of payment established by sect. 49 of the older Act. It is quite possible, as Mr. Russell said, that one reason was to fix the rateable value as distinguished from the gross annual value, a question which gave rise to so much litigation in Dobbs v. Grand Junction Waterworks Company (49 L. T. Rep. 541; 9 App. Cas. 49); but, be that as it may, it is quite impossible, in my opinion, to say that by implication sect. 36 of the Act of 1884 overrides the powers which the corporation have, by virtue of being successors to the company, to make agreements with the various parties. That being so, what is the real position of this defendant? This defendant admits that he would owe 11. 0s. 3d. at the rate of 7½ per cent. under sect. 36, but says that, although that might be so, the defendants have, under some procedure which he attacks and which he objects to, made an arrangement, either public or private, with the ratepayers or water consumers of the borough that they shall only pay at the rate of 5 per cent. In my opinion that is no defence to the claim, and, unless it can be said that an unequal charge makes the charge within the maximum bad, there is no defence to this action. I will say a word or two upon another point. It is, in my opinion, not correct to speak of this corporation as rating for water. There are a great many cases under which corporations may rate for water. There are purposes for which they may include the cost of water, under certain circumstances, in the borough rates, and they are entitled to treat those charges as rates. But in this case the corporation are not rating for water in the ordinary sense or proper sense of the term; they are charging for water at a charge which is fixed by reference to the rateable value and by a percentage thereon, and in my opinion the suggestion that the power to make these charges according to the particular circumstances of the particular case is cut down by sect. 36 is without foundation. A number of other points were raised by Mr. Avory, as, for instance, the operation of sect. 80 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, but I think a little consideration of that section shows that that applies to cases where the water company received money by rates or by charges. That section is a section which provided for a reduction or rebate all round under certain circumstances. I am therefore of opinion that the only ground upon which Bigham, J. decided against the corporation—namely, that there was no right to differentiate, or, in other words, that an equality clause must be held to be implied—was wrong, and the judgment must be reversed. I should like to add that I entirely agree with Bigham, J. in his finding that art. 36 of the Extension Order, of which the words are “other rates made by the corporation,” does not include water rates for the reasons which I have already indicated; and, on the face of that clause, it is quite clear that the rates there referred to are rates other than water rates. I do not think that the scheme could possibly be worked if it was supposed that a rate for the supply of water, which depends to a certain extent upon the individual, was included in such rates as are there referred to, which are clearly general rates levied quite independently of the supply of a commodity to a particular consumer. Therefore, notwithstanding the importance of this case and the respect I attach to the opinion of Bigham, J., I think that this appeal must be allowed, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount they claim.

NORTHAMPTON CORPORATION v. ELLEN.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and, as we are differing from the learned judge below, I will give my reasons. The question is whether the corporation are entitled to differentiate their water rates—that is to say, whether they are entitled to charge persons in one district at one rate and persons in another district at another rate. The respondent in this case successfully resisted a claim for a rate against him at the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and resisted it successfully on the ground that other persons in other parts of the borough were only charged at the rate of 5 per cent. Bigham, J. upheld that view. We have to see whether the statute (the amount is claimed under statutory authority) has or has not imposed any limitation upon the authority of the corporation in imposing this charge, any limitation other than that defining a maximum; in other words, is there any provision in the Act itself that the charge must be made to all persons equally? We have to begin the discussion by admitting that there is no such limitation clearly expressed on the face of the Act. If it is to be collected at all, it is to be collected from the words of sect. 36 of the Act of 1884, and those words, when one examines them, seem to me not to carry the defendant to the full length that it is necessary that he should show that they do carry him in order to succeed in this action. Sect. 36 repealed the section of the earlier Act which provided a number of different standards by which houses of different value should be assessed to this charge. Then it enacted: “The corporation may thenceforward charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable.” The Act uses the words “water rate” there, but does not, by any other expression, indicate any intention that the rate or the charge shall be equal upon every house in proportion to its value in the borough. It does not say so. Mr. Avory contends that “any dwelling-house” must be read as though it were “all dwelling-houses.” That is a gloss which I do not think he can support. The section can be read perfectly easily without substituting “all” for “any”; but, even if we did substitute “all,” I do not think that we could get any further in the discussion, because all that is there imposed is a limit of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as the maximum sum that can be charged by the corporation. Why are we to impart into that that it is to be an equal sum levied upon every person? The only word in the section that gives countenance to that suggestion, or upon which the argument can be founded, is that that which is to be charged is called a “water rate”; but how do we get from that an implication that that must be an equal charge? It seems to me that, as to the basis upon which that conclusion was founded with regard to the poor rate, which is really the foundation of this contention, the basis is quite different in the case of the poor rate from that in the case of such a charge as the water rate. No doubt in the original enactment under which what is called the poor rate was established there is no express provision that there is to be absolute equality. The very nature of the charge itself, and the reasons why it was imposed, and the persons upon whom it was imposed, and the conditions attaching to it, all essentially involve equality, because it is an imposition upon citizens of a duty to the community in proportion to their means, and from that duty imposed necessarily arises the implication of equality—equality in bearing burthens in proportion to their means. What is the analogy between that and the duty of a person who buys a marketable commodity? The corporation here takes the right to sell, and the citizens take the right to buy, a marketable commodity, and there is no analogy between that position in taking from the corporation the water and that of a citizen who is bound according to his means to perform a public duty. One can well see the force of the obligation there of equality; but there is no such analogy in the case of a person merely having a demand in his household for a certain commodity which he has the right to go and demand from the persons who supply it. When we consider that this commodity is necessarily supplied at different costs to different persons in different places, there is no foundation for, and no presumption of, equality; on the contrary, in equity there would be a presumption of inequality, because persons who demand the water, and are given a right to demand it, are necessarily in places where it may be much more expensive in one instance to supply it than it may be in another. Therefore we do not start prima facie with any presumption that there ought to be equality of opportunity and equality of obligation. We clearly have to deal with this on first principles, because the sole foundation for the argument for the respondent is the implication to be drawn from the fact that the word “rate” is used in the section, and that there is a percentage upon value imposed. Now, it seems to me that that is where the case stands upon principle; but I think there is some authority upon the matter also. I think the case that was cited—Hungerford Market Company v. City Steamboat Company (ubi sup.), which was the case of a toll—is an instance of the application of the true principles I have been attempting to set forth. There the thing to be done was the giving of permission to pass over certain property of the charging authority, and it was held there that there was no obligation of equality; or, in other words, that they were entitled to charge tolls at different rates to different persons for what was apparently and practically the same privilege or the same opportunity. Why did the court come to that conclusion? Because there were no words imposing the obligation of equality in the statute which entitled the charging authority to demand these tolls, there was no statutory provision, and there was no necessary implication of equality from the relations of the parties. It seems to me here that if we examine the words which impose, or give the right to impose, the charge, we find no higher implication from the word “rate” used here in the sense in which it is used, and in the connection in which it is used, than we can find from the word “toll” in the other case. Both words really might be interchanged so far as any implication of equality is to be derived from the use of either one or the other in the collocation in which it is used. It is simply a return made for some privilege used, or some article supplied. It is not in any sense based upon equality of duty or equality of obligation, which is really the basis upon which, in the case of poor rate, the inference of equality has been drawn. For these reasons, in addition to those given by the Lord Chief Justice, I am of opinion that we must differ from the decision of Bigham, J., and that this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I need add but little after the judgments which have been already delivered. Certainly, my first impression when the case was opened was rather in favour of the view adopted by the learned judge in the court below; but, after the case has been fully argued and the various Acts bearing upon the question before us have been examined carefully, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in those Acts sufficiently strong to justify this court in holding that all dwelling-houses in Northampton borough must be charged with the same rate. In the first place, let me consider the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847, which was incorporated with the special Act of 1861. Was there anything in that Act which would render it clear that, whenever dwelling-houses have to pay for their water what is called a “rate,” that rate must be the same percentage upon the value in respect of all those dwelling-houses? Well, I certainly cannot find anything in the Act of 1847 sufficient to lead to that conclusion, and, as has already been pointed out by my Lords, there is no principle here which would prima facie make it fair that all dwelling-houses should pay the same percentage upon their rateable value or upon their value. As has been pointed out, taking one simple illustration of two houses of the same value, to supply one with water might cost very much more than to supply the other; the two houses although of the same value might not for the purposes of the consumption of water be at all of the same character; and other illustrations might be supplied. Then, there being no principle as I have said, I cannot find any special provisions in the Act of 1847 which would support the contention of the respondent in this case. I think, in the first place, that under the Act of 1847 the definition of water rate is significant, contained as it is in sect. 3 of the Act. I need not repeat the definition. Although, as to some of the sections in that Act, it is true that it is somewhat difficult to see the exact meaning or effect of certain provisions as to owners or occupiers of dwelling-houses who want water laid on to their premises paying or tendering a water rate in advance unless it means the maximum where no fixed rate is imposed by the special Act, yet, notwithstanding those difficulties, I think a meaning can be given to all those sections without allowing the argument of the respondent in this case; and certainly there is nothing in the difficulties created by those sections which would, I think, in themselves justify this court in upholding in this case the contention of the respondent. That being so, passing from the Act of 1847, the next Act about which I have to say a word or two is the Act of 1861. Now, it is clear that under that Act there is nothing, having regard to its wording, which would have prevented the company by agreement from charging any dwelling-house less than what it was charging other dwelling-house owners generally, according to what may be called a general rate or charge. Sect. 59 of the Act of 1861 is not immaterial in that context; it provides that “the company may from time to time supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required for such remuneration and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person desirous of having such supply of water under a special agreement.” The Act therefore contemplates that by agreement the company, if it chooses, may certainly charge certain dwelling-house owners less than they are charging others; and it is noticeable also that, even as between dwelling-houses strictly so called, under the Act of 1861 there was not a fixed rate, but that the maximum rate that might be charged depended upon the value of the houses. Also it is not to be forgotten that, in considering a question of equality as between persons who are taking water, dwelling-houses properly so called may not constitute even a majority of the hereditaments which require a constant water supply from the company. At any rate, under the Act of 1861, I think it is impossible to say that any specific provision or enactment can be pointed out as tending to support the view that under that Act the company could not as between different dwelling-houses charge a different rate. Then I come to the only other Act about which I need say a word, and that is the Act of 1884. It appears to me sufficient to say that, when you look at sects. 10 and 12 of that Act, it is clear to my mind that whatever powers the company had in this respect under that Act of 1861 the corporation has under the Act of 1884. It seems to me that the corporation have become the owners of the undertaking, and have the same rights with regard to that undertaking as the company had, subject only to those special matters which are mentioned in sect. 10 of the Act of 1884. Certainly I cannot find in that Act any provisions which would justify this court in saying that the main contention of the respondent in this case is correct, and ought to be upheld. With regard to the rest of the case, I desire to add nothing to what has been already said by my Lords.

STUART AND OTHERS v. JOY AND NANTES. (a)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant by lessor running with the reversion—Assignment of reversion by lessor—Liability of lessor to lessee after assignment—Award under arbitration clause—Covenant in new lease to perform award—Action on award—Merger—32 Hen. 8, c. 34, s. 2.

At the expiration of a lease of an oil mill certain differences arose between the lessees and the lessors as to repairs and works to be done on the demised premises, and, these differences having, in pursuance of an arbitration clause in the lease, been referred to arbitration, the arbitrators awarded that certain millstones should be repaired by the lessors. Before the award was published the lessees took from the lessors a new lease which also contained a similar arbitration clause as to differences between the lessors and the lessees, and which, after reciting the reference to arbitration and that the award had not been published, contained a covenant that as soon as the award should be published the lessors should execute all the repairs therein stated to be within their province to repair. Subsequently both the lessees and the lessors assigned their interests in the premises, and, the lessors having refused to do the necessary repairs to the stones, the assignees of the lessees did the repairs, and brought an action on the award to recover the expenses from the lessors.

Held (affirming the judgment of Wright, J.), that the lessors' liability under the award to do the repairs was not merged or extinguished by the covenant in the new lease whereby the lessors covenanted to execute the repairs according to the award, and that an action on the award could be maintained by the lessees and their assignees for the expenses of the repairs which the lessors were bound to do, although there had been no reference to arbitration under the arbitration clause in the new lease.

Semble: A lessor who assigns his reversion remains liable to the lessee upon an express covenant to do repairs to the demised premises—a covenant running with the reversion—as sect. 2 of the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, while giving to the lessee a right of action against the assignee of the lessor for breach of the covenant, does not release the lessor from his express covenant or from his liability thereunder.

Dictum of Lord Macnaghten in Eccles v. Mills (78 L. T. Rep., at p. 210; (1898) A. C., at p. 371) followed.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of Wright, J. in an action tried by him without a jury.

(a) Reported by W. W. OAK, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson and the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited upon an award under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson had been the lessees from the defendants, Joy and Nantes, of a certain oil mill in Kingston-upon-Hull.

The premises were demised by the defendants to the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson in the year 1880, and subsequently in the years 1887 and 1890 respectively.

By these leases it was provided that any dispute or difference which might arise between the lessors and the lessees concerning their rights, duties, or liabilities thereunder should be referred to two arbitrators.

The lease of the 18th Dec. 1890 was for a term of seven years, and during the year 1897 disputes arose between the lessors and the lessees as to their respective rights, duties, or liabilities under the lease and the work to be done on the termination of the lease in performance of the repairing covenants therein.

Thereupon the lessors and lessees duly appointed their respective arbitrators, who on the 17th Feb. 1898 published their award, finding and directing by whom the various repairs and other work specified in the schedule to the award were to be performed.

With regard to a certain pair of millstones described in the schedule as No. 3 pair of stones, with respect to which the present action arose, the arbitrators awarded and found: "This No. 3 set may last for some little while longer until the stones require redressing, and then the whole matter must be taken in hand by the said Douglas Joy and Charles Nantes and made good by them"—that is, by the defendants.

At the expiration of the lease of the 18th Dec. 1890 the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson continued in occupation of the premises, and on the 15th Feb. 1898—that is, two days before the publishing of the award—they took a new lease of the same.

This lease was granted by the defendants as lessors to the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson as lessees. It contained the usual covenants and an arbitration clause as to disputes or differences arising between the lessors and the lessees. It recited that the premises had recently been occupied by the lessees under leases which had expired, the reference to arbitration, that the award had not been made, and it contained the following covenant as to the carrying out of the award by the lessors as to the repairs to be executed by them: "This indenture lastly witnesseth that the lessors do hereby jointly and severally covenant with the lessees and the lessees do hereby jointly and severally covenant with the lessors in manner following (that is to say), that when and as soon as the award of the said . . . in pursuance of the said reference shall be made in writing ready to be delivered to the lessors and the lessees, they, the lessors, will, on or before the 1st day of August 1898, and at a time or times convenient to the lessees, duly complete and execute all the repairs, matters, and things therein stated to be within the province of the lessors."

The award having been made on the 17th Feb. 1898, the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson by an indenture dated the 30th Nov. 1899 assigned their interest in the premises to the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited, who thereafter were the defendants' tenants of the premises.

In 1901 the pair of millstones in question gave way and the stones required redressing, and it thereupon became—as the plaintiffs alleged—the defendants' duty to take in hand and make good the whole matter in performance of the award.

On the 27th July 1901 the plaintiffs by notice in writing required the defendants to perform the award and to put the stones in repair, and gave them notice that in default of their putting the stones in repair they (the plaintiffs) would themselves do the work and hold the defendants liable for the cost thereof and any damages sustained by them by reason of the defendants' failure to perform the award.

The defendants—who had in the meantime, namely, on the 23rd May 1901, assigned their interest to the North-Eastern Railway Company—declined to do the repairs.

The plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited then did the repairs to the stones, and in this action sued the defendants for the cost of so doing, claiming 250*l.* damages.

The defendants in their defence alleged (inter alia) that by an indenture dated the 23rd May 1901 the defendants conveyed to the North-Eastern Railway Company all their estate and interest in the premises, and none of the plaintiffs had since that date been tenants of the defendants.

They further alleged that by the lease of the 15th Feb. 1898 it was agreed and declared that if any dispute or difference should arise between the lessors and the lessees as therein set out no action should be brought in respect thereof unless and until such dispute should have been referred to arbitration as therein provided; that the matters in dispute in this action constituted a dispute within the meaning of that indenture, but had not been referred to arbitration as therein provided, and the defendants contended that the action was not maintainable. They also, without admitting liability, paid 150*l.* into court in satisfaction.

The plaintiffs replied that the matters in dispute in this action were not disputes which arose under the lease of the 15th Feb. 1898, at the date of which lease the arbitration respecting the matters in dispute was pending, and, further, that this lease contained an express covenant to perform and abide by the award, and that the plaintiffs would, if necessary, rely on that covenant as a further cause of action.

Wright, J. held that the action was an action on the award and was maintainable, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 165*l.*

The defendants appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C. and Henn Collins for the defendants (the appellants).—The plaintiffs are not entitled to maintain the action. If the action is on the award, the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited cannot sue on the award, as they can have no rights under it, they not being parties to it, and, even if they had rights under the award, those rights are gone as the award is gone. The award and the covenant in the lease of the 15th Feb. 1898 cannot co-exist together. The efficacy of both cannot survive. The award does not survive, but the covenant clearly does survive. The covenant operates either as a merger of the award, or as an accord and satisfaction of it, so that if the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson have any remedy at all, it is upon the covenant in the lease of Feb. 1898 and not upon the award. But before that covenant can be enforced, there must be a reference to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the same lease, by which all disputes under it were to be referred to arbitration. So that if the action be considered as an action on the award, the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited cannot maintain the action as they were not parties to the award, and the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson cannot maintain the action as the award is gone, the covenant in the lease being substituted for it. Then the next point is as to the effect of the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, upon the assignment in May 1901 by the defendants to the North-Eastern Railway Company, assuming the action to be brought upon the covenant. By that assignment the liability of the lessors upon the covenant passed, under the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, s. 2, to their assignees, and the lessors were thereby relieved from liability. At common law the covenants in the lease did not run with the reversion, but ran only with the land. Then came the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, which in sect. 2 dealt with covenants running with the reversion. By reason of the statute the lessors do not remain liable after the assignment by them. Before the assignment there is privity of estate; after the assignment that privity is gone, and the only privity then would be privity of contract. The statute transfers the privity of contract from the lessor to the assignee of the reversion: (Thuraby v. Plant, 1 Wms. Saund. 237, at pp. 239-240; Bickford v. Parson, 11 L. T. Rep. O. S. 126; 5 C. B. 920, at pp. 930-932); and if the action can be maintained at all it can only be against the assignee of the reversion, in this case the North-Eastern Railway Company:

Conran v. Pedder, 2 Ir. C. L. R. 200.

Other instances in which the expression that "the privity of contract is transferred" by the statute of Henry VIII. occurs are Midgley and Gilbert v. Lovelace (Carthew, 289) and Bacon's Abr. Tit. Covenant, E. 6. If the privity of contract is transferred from the lessor to the assignee of the lessor, then the action cannot be maintained against the lessor. Therefore if the action be on the covenant, the defendants are discharged from the covenant by reason of the assignment; and if it be on the award, there was a dispute within the meaning of the covenant which ought to have been referred to arbitration before it gave a cause of action. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. referred to Beely v. Parry (3 Lev. 154) and Green v. James (6 M. & W. 656).]

Scott Fox, K.C. and A. J. Ashton for the plaintiffs (the respondents).—The learned judge was right. This was really an action on the award and not on the covenant. The statement of claim refers to the award, but does not refer at all to the covenant. There was an obligation on the defendants to perform the award. In Lievestey v. Gilmore (15 L. T. Rep. 386; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 570) Byles, J. says: "In Williams' Saunders (vol. 2, p. 61*n*, note 2) it is laid down that every submission to arbitration implies an obligation to perform the award of the arbitrator." The plaintiffs' claim is on the award, and they had a right to enforce the award quite independently of this lease. But then it is contended that the plaintiffs cannot enforce this award because of the lease of Feb. 1898 and of the covenant therein. That cannot be so, as the covenant does not affect the award or put an end to it. The covenant was not intended to be in substitution of the liability under the award; on the contrary, it clearly recognises the award and expressly provides that the lessors shall execute the repairs according to the award. Therefore it cannot be said that the covenant in the lease of Feb. 1898 is either a merger of the award or an accord and satisfaction of the liability under the award. As put by Maule, J. in Price v. Moulton (10 C. B. 561, at p. 573), it does no more than give the lessees an effectual remedy for the carrying out of the award. In the present case there was no right of action at the time—namely, the 15th Feb. 1898—when this covenant was entered into, and therefore there was no merger by the covenant of the obligation on the award, which was not then made. For the covenant to operate as a merger there must be an obligation which is less than a specialty obligation, and there must be identical debts and the same parties:

Filmer v. Burnby, 2 M. & G. 529;

Auriol v. Mills, 4 T. R. 94 (per Lord Kenyon, C.J., at pp. 98-99).

Then with regard to the question as to whether the lessors remain liable to the lessees notwithstanding an assignment of the reversion, it is clear that the lessors do still remain liable, although by 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, liability also passes to the assignees. The fact that under sect. 2 of that Act the lessees may have a right of action against the assignees of the reversion does not show that the lessors are released from their liability. The statute never intended to take away the liability of the lessor; it merely intended in case of an assignment by the lessor of his interest to give to the lessees a further right of action against the assignee of the lessor, but it did not release the lessor. It is exactly similar to the case of an assignment by the lessee; if the covenant was one which ran with the land, then if the lessee assigned, his assignee became liable under the covenant, but that did not release the lessee himself at common law; and the object of sect. 2 of 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, was to place the assignee of the reversion in precisely the same position as that in which the assignee of the lessee was at common law. That the lessor is not exempt from liability is perfectly clear from Eccles v. Mills (78 L. T. Rep. 206; (1898) A. C. 360), a case which is exactly in point here. It was not necessary for the court there to answer this point as they decided the case on another point, but, as it was dealt with in the court below, they thought it right to express an opinion upon it, and they did so. Lord Macnaghten, speaking of the statute of Henry VIII., there said: (78 L. T. Rep., at p. 210; (1898) A. C. at p. 371): "Whatever liability the statute threw on the specific devisees as assignees of the reversion, that they were bound to bear as between themselves and the lessee. But the testator's estate was also liable." It is submitted that the law is as there stated by Lord Macnaghten. When the expression is used in Thursby v. Plant (ubi sup.) that the privity of contract is transferred by the statute, the word "transfer" does not mean "extinguish," and it cannot mean that the privity is destroyed or extinguished in the lessor:

Mills v. Auriol, 1 H. Bl., at p. 445.

There is no known principle of law which can get rid of the obligation of the covenant on the lessors in this case.

Henn Collins in reply.—The passage cited from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in Eccles v. Mills (ubi sup.) is dictum only, and it was not necessary for the decision of the case. The defendants do not rely so much on the merger as on accord and satisfaction.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment:—This was an appeal from Wright, J., who decided in favour of the plaintiffs in an action brought by Messrs. Stuart and Gregson as lessees, and the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited as assignees, of a lease granted by the defendants Joy and Nantes. The action was founded upon an award whereby the arbitrators, acting under an arbitration clause in a lease or leases previously granted by the defendants Joy and Nantes to the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson, had decided that the defendants should renew certain pairs of millstones. Prior to the 15th Feb. 1898 the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson had occupied, under leases, an oil mill of which the defendants were the lessors. There had been several leasehold terms in succession, but in the year 1898 and prior to February the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson and the defendants had referred the questions which had arisen at the expiration of the then existing term to arbitrators. The award was made on the 17th Feb. 1898. Before the award was made the parties negotiated for a new lease, which was granted on the 15th Feb. 1898 by the defendants as lessors to the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson as lessees. The lease contained the usual covenants and an arbitration clause as to disputes or differences arising between the lessors and lessees. It then recited that the premises had recently been occupied by the lessees under expired leases, the reference to arbitration, that the award had not been made, and contained the following covenant: "Now, therefore, this indenture lastly witnesseth that the lessors do hereby jointly and severally covenant with the lessees and the lessees do hereby jointly and severally covenant with the lessors in manner following (that is to say), that when and so soon as the award of the said William Robert Harrison, Martin Samuelson, and Henry Sharp, in pursuance of the said reference, shall be made in writing ready to be delivered to the lessors and the lessees, they, the lessors, will, on or before the first day of August 1898, and at a time or times convenient to the lessees, duly complete and execute all the repairs, matters, and things therein stated to be within the province of the lessors." The award having been made, as I have already stated, the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson in Nov. 1899 assigned their interest in the premises to the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited, and in 1901, the stones referred to in the award having given way, the defendants were called upon to perform their duty as awarded. They declined to do so, whereupon the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited put the stones in repair at an expense which was agreed between the parties as 165*l.*, for which sum judgment was given for the plaintiffs. Wright, J. decided in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that the action was brought upon the award, and that the defendants, having failed to carry out the award, were liable to the plaintiffs for the amount expended. I am of opinion that the judgment is right, but if I were to state in my own way the reasons for my judgment I would say that both under the award and under the lease, whereby the defendants covenanted to perform the award, they, the defendants, were liable to carry out the award; that, not having done so, an action would lie by the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson to enforce the performance of the award; and that the plaintiffs the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited, who are now beneficially entitled to the lease and have spent the amount which was necessary to carry out the award—the obligation to perform which was upon the defendants—are entitled to recover from the defendants either in their own name, or at any rate in an action to which both they and Messrs. Stuart and Gregson are parties, the amount so paid. In answer to this view a number of points were raised by Mr. Lush and Mr. Collins on behalf of the defendants, with which I will briefly deal. It was first said that the British Oil and Cake Mills Limited have no rights under the award, and, even if they had, these rights were gone because the covenant contained in the lease of the 15th Feb. 1898, to complete and execute the award, took the place of the liability upon the award, and the remedy by the plaintiffs Stuart and Gregson, if any, is upon the covenant. I am of opinion that this point is not sound. The covenant is not in substitution of the liability upon the award, but a recognition of its binding effect, and may well have been thought necessary in order to keep alive the rights of Stuart and Gregson notwithstanding that they had taken a new lease of the premises. But whether the remedy be upon the covenant, or upon the award, for the reasons which I have already stated, it makes no difference. It was then urged that before the covenant could be enforced there must be a reference to arbitration under the arbitration clause in the earlier part of the lease. An examination of the terms of the lease affords the answer to this argument. The lease contained mutual covenants to operate during the term, with the arbitration clause applicable to them. It then went on by express covenant to recognise and continue an obligation of the defendants to obey the award. To say that a second arbitration was necessary before effect could be given to that covenant, or the obligation thereby recognised, seems to me to be a plain contradiction of the express provisions of the deed. Lastly, it was urged that inasmuch as the covenant took the place of the award, and the reversion had been assigned by the defendants to the North-Eastern Railway Company, the defendants were discharged from the obligation imposed upon them by the covenant, and in consequence by the award. For the reasons I have already given this point does not become material, but I think it right to say that, so far as I personally am concerned, I am satisfied that any such view is inconsistent with the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Eccles v. Mills (ubi sup.). For the above reasons I am of opinion that the judgment for the plaintiffs should stand, and the appeal be dismissed with costs.

COZENS HARDY, L.J. read the following judgment:—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, with which I entirely agree, and I do not wish to add anything except upon one point—viz., the liability of the defendants under the express covenant in the lease. It was strenuously argued, particularly by Mr. Henn Collins, that no liability can now be enforced against the lessors inasmuch as they have assigned the reversion, the effect of which was to shift the obligation from the lessors to the assignees. I assume, in favour of the appellants, that the covenant to execute repairs on the demised premises in obedience to the award to be made was a covenant running with the reversion to which the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, applies. If so, sect. 2 gives the lessees a right of action against the assignees of the reversion for breach of the covenant. But it is difficult to see why that enactment should release the lessors from their express covenant. There is nothing in the language of the section to lead to this conclusion. It is true that in Thursby v. Plant (1 Wms. Saund. 237, at p. 240) it is said that the statute has transferred the privity of contract from the lessor to the assignee of the reversion, but that does not mean anything more than that the assignee of the reversion is made liable by the statute in the same manner as at common law the assignee of the lease was liable. In every case the express covenants entered into by the lessor with the lessee or by the lessee with the lessor remain unaffected. The consequence of holding that a landlord can escape from all liability upon his express covenants in the lease by assigning to a pauper would be alarming. In my opinion, the position of the lessor with respect to covenants running with the reversion is now precisely similar to the position of the lessee with respect to covenants running with the lease. In neither case is liability extinguished by assignment. No authority contrary to this view has been called to our attention, but the very point was raised before the Privy Council in Eccles v. Mills (ubi sup.). That case was ultimately decided on the ground that the covenant in question by the testator, who was the lessor, did not run with the reversion, but the arguments and the judgment dealt with the case also on the alternative view, which had been adopted in the court below, that the covenant did run with the reversion; and Lord Macnaghten (78 L. T. Rep., at p. 210; (1898) A. C., at p. 371) says: "Whatever liability the statute threw on the specific devisees as assignees of the reversion, that they were bound to bear as between themselves and the lessee. But the testator's estate was also liable." This dictum, though not necessary for the decision of the case, strongly supports the view which, apart from authority, I have expressed. For these reasons I think that the lessees and the assignees of the lease, as co-plaintiffs, can maintain the present action against the lessors for breach of the covenant to obey the award.

Re DOWDING; GREGORY v. DOWDING. (a)

By her marriage settlement, dated in 1886, a wife covenanted to settle all her after-acquired property, real and personal, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise (with certain small exceptions), upon trust to be sold and converted and held by the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement. During the coverture the wife became entitled to certain annuities.

Held, that the annuities were not caught by the covenant.

White v. Biggs (22 Beav. 176n.) and Townshend v. Harrowby (4 Jur. N. S. 353) followed.

Scholfield v. Spooner (51 L. T. Rep. 138; 26 Ch. Div. 94) distinguished.

By a settlement dated the 5th May 1886, made upon the marriage of the Rev. J. W. Dowding with Margaret Carwithen, afterwards Dowding, the intended wife agreed that all real and personal property (if any) not therein before settled to which she at the time of the intended marriage or at any time during her intended coverture should be or become entitled, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise, except jewels, trinkets, ornaments of the person, plate, linen, and china, furniture, prints, books, or other articles of like nature, and also except legacies or other property acquired at one and the same time not exceeding in amount or value the sum of 100l., should . . . be assured and transferred by the intended wife and all other necessary parties (if any) to the trustees of the settlement upon trust at such time and in such manner as they should think fit . . . to sell and convert into money such part of the said property as should not consist of money or of investments authorised by the settlement, and should stand possessed of the said investments and of the moneys to arise from such conversion as aforesaid upon the trusts and with the powers thereinbefore declared concerning the wife's trust funds, and so long as any such property remained unsettled upon trust to pay the income thereof to the persons for the time being entitled to receive the income of the wife's trust funds.

The trusts declared concerning the wife's trust funds were that the trustees should stand possessed of them upon trust to invest the same as and when received in certain specified securities and to pay the income thereof to the intended husband for his life and after his death to the intended wife for her life, and after the death of the survivor of them upon trust, both as to capital and income, for the children of the intended marriage as therein set out.

The Rev. W. H. Carwithen, who died on the 11th April 1903, by his will, dated the 20th Aug. 1894, gave an annuity of 40l. to his daughter, the above-mentioned Margaret Dowding, for her life, and by a codicil to his will, dated the 4th Aug. 1896, gave her an additional annuity of 60l. for her life.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the marriage settlement asking whether Margaret Dowding, under agreement to settle after-acquired property, was bound to assign and transfer to them the two annuities, and, if so, whether they ought to be treated as capital or income.

H. T. Methold for the trustees.

T. T. Methold for the husband and wife.—These annuities are not caught by the covenant. They are legacies within the exception. Life interests are not bound by a covenant of this nature. They could only be bound if the trusts declared fitted them, and in this case the trust for conversion is inconsistent with the nature of an annuity and does not fit it:

White v. Briggs, 22 Beav. 176n (also 2 Ph. 583);

S. B. L. Druce for the children of the marriage.—The annuities are not legacies within the exception. They are caught by the covenant, which is in the widest terms and intended to include property of every description:

Scholfield v. Spooner, 51 L. T. Rep. 138; 26 Ch. Div. 94;

Lewis v. Madocks, 8 Ves. 150; 17 Ves. 48.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question is whether two annuities given to a married lady are caught by a covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in a marriage settlement. It is a covenant though it is in the form of an agreement; it is executed by all the parties, and it is a covenant by all. The covenant is in the widest possible terms. I cannot conceive that anyone could put it in wider terms: "All real and personal property (if any) not hereinbefore settled to which the said Margaret Carwithen at the time of the said intended marriage or at any time during her intended coverture shall be or become entitled, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise,"—there are certain exceptions which I must notice for two reasons: first, because it is said that one of these exceptions includes these annuities so that they are literally excepted from the operation of the covenant; secondly, because it is always necessary where there are exceptions to a general provision to see what is regarded as excepted in order that from that you may obtain light as to what is intended to be included—"except jewels, trinkets, ornaments of the person, plate, linen, and china, furniture, prints, books, or other articles of the like nature, and also except any legacies or other property acquired at one and the same time not exceeding in amount or value the sum of 100*l*." It is said that these annuities are legacies within that exception. For some purposes no doubt an annuity is a legacy, a legacy payable by instalments, and if that were the right view to take in this case the instalments are less than 100*l*., so that no part of them would be settled. But an annuity is not a legacy for all purposes, and in ordinary phraseology an annuity is distinct from a legacy. A legacy is a sum which the legatee is entitled to have paid down; an annuity is a sum which is to be secured by setting apart a portion of the personal estate and has to be paid in the shape of an annual payment, and in that sense it is not a legacy. In my opinion it would be entirely wrong to hold that these annuities were legacies within the exception. Then the question is whether these annuities are covered. They are within the words "all real and personal property to which the said Margaret Carwithen at any time during the said intended coverture shall be or become entitled." Of course, I am bound to construe those words according to the intention of the parties, and it may appear that an intention may be presumed or proved in some way or other that these annuities are not meant to be caught; but the words themselves are large enough. Nor is it said that annuities according to the ordinary practice for those who draw marriage settlements cannot be included in covenants to settle after-acquired property. On the contrary, I asked Mr. Methold, and he confirmed my own impression that the ordinary precedents for covenants to settle after-acquired property do include annuities and life interests; but when the draft is properly settled there is a direction that annuities and life interests shall be held for the benefit of the husband and wife as the case may be, and possibly, where they are for the benefit of the wife, shall be held for her separate use without power of anticipation. Therefore, apart from one authority which I will deal with presently—where the question was as to a life interest being included—there is no doubt that an annuity may be properly included. There is nothing foreign to the purpose of a covenant to settle after-acquired property in including an annuity. In one sense, therefore, the covenant fits the property, or the property fits the covenant. The difficulty arises from this, that the trust is for conversion, that that which is really the life interest of the wife is to be converted by the sale out and out of the annuity, or possibly by investing the annuity when it is received from time to time, and that is to be capitalised so that the wife or the husband who takes the first life interest would only receive the dividends. That is where the pinch occurs. You can make the covenant fit the annuity, and you can make the annuity fit the covenant, but they do not fit as they stand—that is to say, not according to the ordinary practice of mankind; and it goes against one's general knowledge of what is done on these occasions to say that that which is an annuity is to be capitalised and only to become a dividend-earning fund. These difficulties have occurred again and again, and several cases have been cited in which this question has been discussed. A great difficulty of this kind occurred in the case of Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.). I mention that case because it has given rise to a certain amount of discussion from time to time. There the husband gave a bond with a condition to settle all the personal estate that he should at any time during the coverture be possessed of. The Lord Chancellor pointed out the great difficulty of executing the instrument, but thought that he was constrained by the general words of the bond, and declared that the personal estate of which the husband was possessed during the coverture was liable to the bond. This in so many words would appear to include every sovereign that came into his purse during the coverture, and it did occur to me, when the question came before me in Re Bendy (ubi sup.), that the Lord Chancellor meant that where you had a general covenant of that kind you must execute it, however absurd it might be and however great the practical difficulty might be in giving effect to it. But a similar case came before Romer, J.—Finlay v. Darling (ubi sup.)—and he differed, and, I have no doubt, differed soundly, from the view which I took of Lord Eldon's decision in Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.). After showing that that was a simple covenant by the husband to settle the whole of his personal estate, however acquired, he said this: "Lord Eldon pointed out in that case even that income which the husband received would not be bound by the covenant; but he did say that if that income became capital, then the capital that accrued to him would be bound. I do not know that that decision went so far as that, but certainly there is a statement of Lord Eldon to that effect. In the first place, I think that his observation must have been limited in its application to the case immediately before him, which, as I pointed out, concerned and dealt with a covenant of a substantially different kind from the covenant before me; and, secondly, I am not sure that Lord Eldon did not mean by the word 'capital' capital which was so held by the husband as to show that he intended it to become part of his personal estate which was bound by his covenant." I quote that as showing that there may be a way out of a covenant of that kind, and that Romer, J. thought that Lord Eldon meant to get out of it in that way, although his language was more general, and that he himself would have been able to do so. Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.) was referred to by Lord Romilly in his judgment in St. Aubyn v. Humphreys (ubi sup.), although apparently not cited in the argument. In St. Aubyn v. Humphreys (ubi sup.) there was a settlement by the husband of all his personal estate to which he was then or might thereafter become entitled in trust for himself for life with remainder absolutely to his wife. That, as regards the subject-matter of the settlement, was not unlike the bond in Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.). It was held not to comprise his interest in a fund bequeathed to him for life with remainder to his children. All that the Master of the Rolls says is: "Upon consideration of the case of Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.) and of White v. Briggs (ubi sup.), mentioned to me by Mr. Bagshawe, I am of opinion that I must hold"—and he held that the life interest was not caught by the settlement. The judgment of the Master of the Rolls, therefore, is of no value of itself. He looked at Lewis v. Madocks (ubi sup.) and read that with White v. Briggs (ubi sup.), and thought that he was bound by authority to hold as he did. I have not, therefore, the advantage of the independent judgment of the Master of the Rolls, but I have the advantage of the decision in White v. Briggs (ubi sup.), which is reported in a note to St. Aubyn v. Humphreys (ubi sup.). That, in my opinion, is a case of great importance. There there was a covenant by the husband to settle one moiety of the property he should acquire during the coverture upon the usual trusts. It was in quite general terms. It was held not to include his life interest in property bequeathed to him for the benefit of himself and his family. Some little account is given there of the nature of the bequest. There was a direction under a will to settle property on the husband and his family. That gave rise to a good deal of litigation, and ultimately Lord Cottenham determined that that direction meant that the husband took a life interest only (that is reported in 2 Ph. 583). Then the reporter tells us this, that he afterwards declared "that the interest which Charles Herbert White took under the will was not subject to the covenant contained in his marriage settlement." Therefore we have a distinct decision of Lord Cottenham, than whom there could not possibly be a higher authority, that a covenant to settle after-acquired property, framed in the most general terms, did not include a life interest given to the covenantor by will; and the Master of the Rolls followed that. I say nothing about the other case cited there—Duncan v. Cannan (No. 2) (21 Beav. 307)—because, in my opinion, that was a case of a different character. Then I am referred to a case before Kindersley, V.C.—Townshend v. Harrowby (ubi sup.). There the Vice-Chancellor had to deal with a covenant framed in the broadest possible terms to settle the wife's after-acquired property, and one of the questions was whether a life interest was covered by it. The Vice-Chancellor expressed a decided opinion upon it. He says: "It appears to me upon the whole scope of such a clause as this (assuming it in the strongest way against the lady), holding her to be covenantor, and holding her to be the person who is to do the act, that it is beyond the principle upon which the court has interpreted such clauses to hold that that applies to a mere life interest. It appears to me that if Lord Townshend had himself covenanted in the same terms as in this clause, the court would not hold that the covenant applied to a mere life interest—an interest limited to his life—so as to say that that life interest must be turned into corpus; that each annual or half-yearly payment on that life income was to be assigned over to the trustees to be capitalised, so that he, as tenant for life under the settlement, would only have the income arising from the investment of each successive sum as it accrued due from the property. I consider, therefore, that the life interest to the separate use of Lady Townshend is not affected by this covenant. If it had been an absolute interest to her use, I should consider it was affected; but, being a mere life interest, it does not signify whether it is to her separate use or not. It appears to me that it is not within the letter of the covenant." That is a distinct finding by a most experienced judge that a life interest is not within a covenant in general terms to settle after-acquired property. Unless there is some authority to the contrary overruling the decision of Kindersley, V.C. and differing from the decision of Lord Cottenham, I am bound to hold that a covenant of this kind does not cover a life interest. What is there to the contrary? I can see nothing in any one of the cases cited which touches those authorities. The case mainly relied on is Scholfield v. Spooner (ubi sup.); but before dealing with that case I ought perhaps to mention a case before North, J. which was cited to me—Re Crawshaw (ubi sup.). That does not really touch this case, because North, J. declined to try the question whether any life interest was affected by the covenant in that case, and he held that the particular life interest in that case was not affected because it was not assignable. Scholfield v. Spooner (ubi sup.) deserves more attention. On the covenant in that case there can be no question that the framer of the covenant contemplated including in it annuities and life interests, but by some curious omission there was no trust declared as to those annuities and life interests when assigned to the trustees, and it was argued in the Court of Appeal that, because there were no trusts declared, therefore the court could not hold the annuity therein question to be included in the covenant at all. To that there was a conclusive answer: "Upon the construction of the covenant, annuities are to be included in it, and, that being so, they must be brought within the settlement and held upon some trusts or other." If there are no trusts declared, then they are to be found by proper construction of the document. That is the substance of the decision. Of course, there is really no doubt that annuities may be properly included in covenants of this kind if there are apt words, and in Scholfield v. Spooner (ubi sup.) there were special words showing clearly that annuities were intended to be included in the covenant, and that distinguishes that case from this. White v. Briggs (ubi sup.) and Townshend v. Harrowby (ubi sup.) were not cited in Scholfield v. Spooner (ubi sup.), and it does not touch the question raised in this case, which is this: Whether where the covenant is framed in general terms and there is nothing in the settlement to bring in an annuity or life interest specifically, the inclusion of an annuity or life interest is consistent with the general intention of the parties in making the settlement. That question was not affected by Scholfield v. Spooner (ubi sup.). It seems to me that I am in the same position as Lord Romilly found himself in, except that I am more strongly bound. He was bound by White v. Briggs (ubi sup.). I am bound by White v. Briggs (ubi sup.) and Townshend v. Harrowby (ubi sup.). There is no case the other way, and I must hold that, strong and general as the words are, quite strong enough by themselves to include an annuity or a life interest, yet, having regard to the general intention of the parties, I must hold that these annuities are not covered by the covenant.

CHRISTY v. TIPPER; Re YOUNG'S TRADE MARK.

Jan. 19, 20, 21, 22, and Feb. 1.

CHRISTY v. TIPPER; Re YOUNG'S TRADE MARK. (a)

Trade mark—"Invented word"—"Absorbine"—Removal from register—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64, sub-s. 1—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 10, sub-s. 1.

Y., a manufacturing chemist, residing in America, obtained in Nov. 1901 the registration in the United Kingdom of the word "Absorbine" as a trade mark in respect of chemical substances used for agricultural, horticultural, veterinary, and sanitary purposes, and also in respect of chemical substances prepared for use in medicine and pharmacy. He used the word in connection with a liquid preparation designed to absorb and remove various growths and diseases in animals.

Messrs. T. were well-known manufacturers of an ointment intended for similar purposes, which they sold under the name of "Absorbent" till 1901, but about the time of Y.'s registration of "Absorbine" they, without any knowledge of that fact, changed the name of their ointment to "Absorbine," and sold it under that name.

Y. and his English agents, Messrs. C., brought an action against them to restrain them from infringing the registered trade mark "Absorbine," and from passing off any veterinary preparation as a preparation of the plaintiffs'.

Messrs. T. contended that "Absorbine" ought not to have been registered as a trade mark, and moved to expunge it from the register.

Held, that "Absorbine" was not an invented word, since the first two syllables formed an ordinary English word, and the last was a meaningless flourish or termination, and there was no invention in continuing the syllables; and that it must therefore be expunged from the register, and the action be dismissed.

TRIAL of action and motion for rectification of register.

Mr. Wilbur Fenelon Young, a manufacturing chemist carrying on business in Springfield, Massachusetts, United States of America, was the manufacturer of a medicinal preparation for veterinary purposes, and Messrs. Thomas Christy and Co., a firm of wholesale druggists in the city of London, were his sole agents in this country for the sale of it.

The preparation had been sold in America for some years under the name of "Absorbine," and there had also been sales of it under that name in this country.

On the 21st Nov. 1901 Mr. Young applied for and in due course obtained registration in the United Kingdom, as of that date, of the word "Absorbine" as his trade mark.

He was registered as proprietor of the trade mark "Absorbine," No. 242,163, in class 2, in respect of chemical substances used for agricultural, horticultural, veterinary, and sanitary purposes, and in class 3, No. 242,164, in respect of chemical substances prepared for use in medicine and pharmacy.

The following disclaimer appeared on the register: "No claim is made to the exclusive use of the word 'absorb.'"

"Absorbine" had been described by Mr. Young, in an application for its registration in America, as an arbitrary or arbitrarily chosen word. Its user by him appeared to have been solely in connection with and as a designation of his preparation, which was a liquid one, professing to be prepared especially to absorb and remove "wind-puff, capped hock, thorough-pin, fatty tumours, enlarged glands, and all puffs and swellings." It was made up and sold in bottles contained in carton boxes.

Messrs. B. C. Tipper and Son, who had for many years past carried on in Birmingham a large and well-known business as manufacturers and vendors of various medical preparations for veterinary purposes, had, among other preparations, prepared and sold in pots a grease or ointment used as a remedy for bony and other enlargements on animals, and acting as an absorbent of excrescences.

Down to the year 1901 Messrs. Tipper and Son had sold this ointment under the name of "Absorbent"; but in the autumn of 1901 they determined to change words such as "Absorbent" to others of a more fanciful description, and accordingly they in Oct. 1901 reprinted their labels and catalogue and described the ointment as "Absorbine," under which name they had since sold it.

In doing this they had no knowledge of the sale by Messrs. Christy and Co. of Mr. Young's preparation as "Absorbine," nor of Mr. Young's intention to register "Absorbine" as his trade mark; and in Dec. 1902, on discovering the use by Messrs. Christy and Co. of the word "Absorbine," they wrote requesting them to desist from using it.

This Messrs. Christy and Co. refused to do, and they in their turn asserted their right to the word, and demanded that Messrs. Tipper and Son should abandon it.

Eventually, in March 1903, Messrs. Christy and Co. and Mr. Young commenced this action against Messrs. Tipper and Son, claiming an injunction restraining them, their servants and agents, from selling or offering or exposing or advertising for sale or procuring to be sold any veterinary preparation not of the plaintiff's manufacture under the name of "Absorbine" or under any other name which, by reason of colourable imitation thereof or otherwise, was calculated to represent or lead to the belief that such preparation was a preparation of the plaintiff's; from in any manner infringing the plaintiff's registered trade mark, No. 242,163; and from in any manner passing off or enabling or assisting others to pass off any such veterinary preparation as or for a preparation of the plaintiff's, together with damages or an account of profits and an order for delivery up or destruction of labels, &c., of the defendants offending against the injunctions.

The defendants contended that, apart from all other questions arising in the action, the registration of "Absorbine" as a trade mark was improper on the grounds that it was not an invented word or distinctive of the plaintiff's goods, but merely descriptive of the character or quality of the article, and had prior to registration been used by the defendants and other persons in connection with similar articles.

[CHAN. DIV.]

They moved for the rectification of the Register of Trade Marks by the removal of the trade mark "Absorbine" in both classes.

The action and motion were tried together, and evidence was given of the use of the word "Absorbine" and words of similar meaning in connection with such preparations by the plaintiffs and defendants and other persons in this country and the United States, and of the nature of the respective preparations and the extent to which they had been advertised and sold.

Hughes, K.C. and Sebastian for the plaintiffs in the action, respondents to the motion.—A word is "invented" if it has not previously been in general use as an English word and is not a compound of existing words. See the judgments of the House of Lords in Eastman Photographic Materials Company v. Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks (79 L. T. Rep. 195; (1898) A. C. 571), which decided that an invented word may have reference to the character or quality of the goods. See also J. C. and J. Field and Co. v. Wagel Syndicate (82 L. T. Rep. 231; 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 266), where "Savonol" was held to be an invented word. A word may be a good trade mark though it is not absolutely new, but has been used before:

Nor can the defendants take advantage of user of "Absorbine" or similar words by third parties:

Paine and Co. v. Daniells and Sons' Breweries; Re Paine and Co.'s Trade Marks, 68 L. T. Rep. 801; (1893) 2 Ch. 567.

With regard to our claim in the action, the evidence shows that "Absorbine" would be taken by anyone to refer to our preparation, and we should be entitled to an injunction to restrain passing off even if our trade mark had been expunged from the register:

Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Company v. Powell, 76 L. T. Rep. 792; (1897) A. C. 710.

Younger, K.C. and E. P. Hewitt for the defendants in the action, applicants on the motion.—Before the decision in the "Solio" case, Eastman Photographic Materials Company v. Comptroller-General (ubi sup.), a word formed in the same way as "Absorbine" here—"Satinine"—had been held not to be an invented word in Re Meyerstein's Trade Mark (62 L. T. Rep. 526; 43 Ch. Div. 604); and we contend that there is nothing in the "Solio" decision which is at variance with this, nor with the similar decision that "Eboline" was not an invented word in Re Sir Titus Salt, Bart., Sons, and Co.'s Application (71 L. T. Rep. 386; (1894) 3 Ch. 166). These cases and Re Farbenfabriken Application (70 L. T. Rep. 186; (1894) 1 Ch. 645) were the leading authorities on the subject at the date of the decision in the "Solio" case, and in that case Lord Herschell (1898) A. C., at p. 580 expressly approved of the decision in Re Farbenfabriken Application (ubi sup.) with a qualification only as to foreign words. The "Solio" case (ubi sup.) merely decided that clauses (d) and (e) in sub-sect. 1 of sect. 10 of the Patents, &c., Act 1888 are independent of each other. It did not introduce any great change into the law, and the judgments of Lords Halsbury, Herschell, Macnaghten, and Shand are in our favour, and Buckley, J.'s words in J. C. and

J. Field and Co. v. Wagel Syndicate (17 Rep. Pat. Cas., at p. 271) show that he took this view of Lords Herschell and Macnaghten's judgments. An invented word cannot be made by taking an existing English word, at all events, and adding a meaningless syllable. The word must be new and freshly coined:

Re British Electrosons Company's Application, 13 Rep. Pat. Cas. 447;

Re Farbenfabriken Application (ubi sup.).

Even if the decision in Re Linotype Company's Trade Mark (ubi sup.) was correct, it was based on the fact that there had been no real publication of the word in this country. The word cannot be a trade mark if it has been used in a foreign country to describe the article, as "Absorbine" has been in the United States:

Re British Electrosons Company's Application (ubi sup.);

Re Densham's Trade Mark, 72 L. T. Rep. 148; and in the Ct. of App. ib. 614; (1895) 2 Ch. 176.

With regard to the claim in the action, it cannot be suggested that our sale of our preparation deceives anyone. The plaintiffs' preparation is a liniment and ours is an ointment, and, in the absence of evidence that the sale is calculated to deceive, the plaintiffs cannot succeed in an action against us for using their trade mark in connection with a totally different kind of goods:

Edwards v. Dennis; Re Edwards' Trade Mark, 54 L. T. Rep. 112; 30 Ch. Div. 454.

R. J. Parker for the Comptroller-General.

Hughes, K.C. in reply.—As to the previous user of the word in the United States, the plaintiff Young cannot be debarred from registering it as a trade mark by reason of the fact that he himself invented and used it. With regard to the suggestion that the goods of the plaintiffs and defendants are of different kinds, they are both veterinary preparations, merely made up in different forms. The decision in Edwards v. Dennis (ubi sup.) really turned, as is clear from the words of Fry, L.J. (30 Ch. Div., at p. 479), on the fact that the trade mark had been assigned, and the assignee claimed to use it for a wider class of goods than it had been used for by his assignor. Moreover, no one wanting wire, as in that case, would take iron sheets; but anyone wanting a veterinary remedy called "Absorbine," and not knowing its form, would take what was offered him. The use of the same word to describe two veterinary preparations must be calculated to deceive, and evidence is not necessary. He referred to North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Company v. Manchester Brewery Company, 79 L. T. Rep. 645; (1899) A. C. 83.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—JOYCE, J., after stating the facts respecting the registration of the trade mark "Absorbine" by Mr. Young and the nature of the preparations of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively, said that the defendants appeared to be perfectly honest and honourable tradesmen and to have changed the title of their ointment without any knowledge of what the plaintiffs were doing. His Lordship then said that in his opinion the only ground for the passing-off action was the use of the word "Absorbine," and that, if "Absorbine" were allowed to remain on the register, the action for passing off, as distinguished from infringement of trade mark, was unnecessary. He then continued: It is quite clear that the word "Absorbine" has obvious reference to the character or quality of the goods. It can only be registered, if at all, under sect. 64, sub-sect. (1) (d), of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1888 as being an "invented word." Whether it is or is not an "invented word" within the meaning of the statute is the single question that remains for me to decide. The first two syllables of the word now under consideration are beyond all question the common English word "absorb." I have not been told how the whole word was invented. In the application for its registration in America it was spoken of by the applicant as an arbitrary or arbitrarily chosen word. It may simply be a misspelling of the present participle of the verb "absorb," or represent that participle pronounced in a careless, slovenly fashion—I may almost say as frequently pronounced by ordinary people. If it be that, it is certainly incapable of registration in respect of such a veterinary medicament as that of the plaintiffs. Or it may be the common English verb "absorb" with a common termination added thereto. Such a termination is found in very many words designating chemical substances, as may be seen by reference to the index to any manual of chemistry—e.g., chlorine, glycerine, pepsine, saccharine. It is also frequently found as a mere termination in the names of medicinal and other preparations which are sometimes referred to as proprietary articles—e.g., maltine, phospherine, sulpholine, brilliantine, &c. When so used, I am not aware that the syllable "ine" has any meaning at all of itself; nor has it any here. It is little, if anything, more than a sort of flourish, rounding off the word or expression to which it is attached in order to make a euphonious name. In the "Solio" case (Eastman Photographic Materials Company v. Comptroller-General, 79 L. T. Rep. 195; (1898) A. C. 571) it was decided, contrary to what had previously been held, that a word might be a good invented word although it might have some reference to the character or quality of the goods, and that the word "Solio" was an invented word. But the present Lord Chancellor, in the course of his observations, said (1898) A. C., at p. 577: "My Lords, I desire to give my opinion with reference to the particular words, and not to go behind it. I can quite understand suggesting other words—compound words or foreign words—as to which it would be impossible to say that they were invented words, although perhaps never seen before, or that they did not indicate the character or quality of the goods, although as words of the English tongue they had never been seen before. Suppose a person were to attempt to register as a single English word 'Cheapand-good,' or, even without taking so gross an example, using a word so slightly differing from an ordinary and recognised word as to be neither an invented word nor, avoiding the prohibited choice of a word, indicating character or quality. The line must sometimes be difficult to draw; but to my mind the substance of the enactment is intelligible enough, and the comptroller has to make up his mind whether in substance there has been an infringement of the rule. Of course, also, words which are merely misspelt, but which are nevertheless, in sound, ordinary English words, and the use of which may tend to deceive, ought not to be permitted." And Lord Herschell, a very high authority on the subject, said (at p. 581): "It may, no doubt, sometimes be difficult to determine whether a word is an invented word or not. I do not think the combination of two English words is an invented word, even although the combination may not have been in use before; nor do I think that a mere variation of the orthography or termination of a word would be sufficient to constitute an invented word, if to the eye or ear the same idea would be conveyed by the word in its ordinary form." And Lord Shand in the same case said (p. 584): "At the same time I agree with your Lordships, and particularly with what has been said by my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten, in thinking, especially after the decision to be given in this case, that the Comptroller-General will be fully warranted in taking care that there shall not be admitted, under the guise or cover of words called 'invented' by the applicant, words really in ordinary use, which might, in a disguised form, have reference to the character or quality of the goods. There must be invention, and not the appearance of invention only. It is not possible to define the extent of invention required; but the words, I think, should be clearly and substantially different from any word in ordinary and common use. The employment of a word in such use, with a diminutive or a short and meaningless syllable added to it, or a mere combination of two known words, would not be an invented word; and a word would not be 'invented' which, with some trifling addition or very trifling variation, still leaves the word one which is well known or in ordinary use, and which would be quite understood as intended to convey the meaning of such a word." I know of no authority which requires me to hold that a word such as "Absorbine" is an invented word. None of the syllables or parts of which the word is composed is invented, and I see no invention in the combining of them so as to form the whole. The case of Re Linotype Company's Trade Mark (82 L. T. Rep. 794; (1900) 2 Ch. 238) was materially different from the present case; and so, I think, was that of "Savonol" (J. C. and J. Field and Co. v. Wagel Syndicate, 82 L. T. Rep. 231; 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 266). Under the circumstances I find myself compelled to hold that "Absorbine" is not an invented word; and consequently it must be expunged from the register of trade marks, and the action must be dismissed, with the usual consequences.

Licensing—Order taken by traveller—Appropriation—Sale off licensed premises—Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.An order for beer having been given to the traveller of a person licensed to retail beer at his premises by a customer at such customer's house, the traveller handed the order to the licensee at the licensed premises, who appropriated the beer by placing it in a box at those premises with a piece of paper on which was the customer's name. The beer was delivered and paid for at the customer's house.Held, that this was not a sale off the licensed premises.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant for unlawfully selling by retail certain bottles of beer and stout at a house where he was not then authorised by licence to sell the same.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The appellant was a grocer and held a retail off-licence for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits at his premises at Kingston-upon-Hull.

On the 17th Dec. 1902 the appellant's traveller went to Kirkella, a village some few miles distant from Kingston-upon-Hull, and called at the house of one Goulding, who gave him an order for six bottles of beer and six bottles of stout. The traveller made an entry of the order in his order-book, and upon his return in the evening to Kingston-upon-Hull handed his order-book to the appellant at the licensed premises.

On the 23rd Dec. the appellant wrote out from his order-book a delivery list of the goods which the traveller was to deliver the following day when, in the ordinary course, he would again visit Kirkella, and this list included the beer and stout ordered by Goulding.

By means of this list the various goods ordered by Goulding and others in the previous week were got ready by the appellant for each customer, and were loaded for delivery for such customers upon the appellant's trolley at the licensed premises on the 24th Dec.

The bottles for Goulding were selected by the appellant at the licensed premises, and were then placed in a wooden box, partitioned so as to hold twelve bottles and no more, and a piece of paper, with the name of Goulding on, was put into the box at the licensed premises, and the goods were then loaded for delivery. This box and its contents and the slip of paper were delivered at Goulding's house at Kirkella on the 24th Dec., and were paid for on delivery.

The appellant stated that if any of the bottles had been broken in transit and before delivery he should have borne the loss, as otherwise he would have lost a customer.

The respondent contended that the sale of the beer and stout took place at Goulding's house at Kirkella; that the property in the goods did not pass and there was no appropriation thereof until delivery; and that what was done on the licensed premises of the appellant did not constitute in law an appropriation of the goods to Goulding.

The appellant cited the case of Pletts v. Beattie (74 L. T. Rep. 148; (1896) 1 Q. B. 519).

The justices were of opinion that there was no appropriation of the goods at the appellant's licensed premises, and that therefore the sale took place at Kirkella.

They therefore convicted the appellant.

Lush, K.C. and Shortt for the appellant.

Avory, K.C. and Biron for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Owing to the way in which the facts are stated, the case is not free from difficulty. The appellant was summoned for unlawfully selling beer by retail at a house where he was not then authorised by his licence to sell the same, and so the onus was on the prosecution to show a sale off the premises. The order was taken off the licensed premises, but was handed to the appellant at the licensed premises and accepted by him there. The goods were selected and placed aside at the licensed premises, and there was a subsequent delivery of the appropriated goods. I do not think the facts show a sale off the premises according to the authorities. They show a transaction where the contract was made on the licensed premises, though that might not be sufficient to pass the property in the goods, but, so far as the Licensing Act is concerned, I think the sale took place on the licensed premises.

HAYCOCKS LIMITED v. MULHOLLAND. (a)

Practice—Costs—Reference to master under Order XIV.—High Court scale—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

Where an action is brought in the High Court and an application is made under Order XIV., and the action is referred to a master under rule 7 of that order, if the plaintiff recovers more than 20l., but less than 50l., he can only recover County Court costs of action, but, so far as the costs of the reference are concerned, the master is to be deemed an arbitrator, and he has the same discretion as to costs, including the power to certify for High Court costs of the reference, as an arbitrator has.

A master has no power to extend the twenty-one days allowed for obtaining judgment under Order XIV. with High Court costs, as by sect. 116 of the County Courts Act 1888 that power is only given to a judge of the High Court.

APPEAL in chambers from the order of a master.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the written judgment of the learned judge, which was read in court.

WORDSLEY BREWERY COMPANY (apps.) v. HALFORD (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Dec. 8.—PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the summons came before me in chambers, and was argued by counsel on the 28th Nov. last. I took time to consider what my order should be, and as the matter involves some questions of importance with regard to the procedure in small debt cases, I thought it well to have information from the masters of the King's Bench Division, and to give my judgment in court. The action is brought on a tradesman's bill for a small balance of account representing items of dispute between the tradesman and his employer in a bill of considerable amount. The sums taken out under Order XIV. was heard before a master on the 29th Oct. last. No order was drawn up upon this summons, but the master's note upon it is as follows: "Adjourned for trial before master." Thereafter the case was tried before the same master, witnesses were examined, and the master finally decided in favour of the plaintiffs for 23*l.* 15*s.*, which, if I recollect rightly, was either the whole or nearly the whole of the plaintiff's claim. The master proceeded to embody his judgment in the following terms: "It is ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to sign judgment for 23*l.* 15*s.* with 7*l.* costs of action, and also with costs of the reference to the master and his award, such costs to be taxed by the taxing master on the High Court scale, with the certificate that the action was a fit action to be brought in the High Court. This is the order under appeal; and the application to me is that I should vary it by directing that the plaintiffs should sign judgment with costs on the County Court scale. In the first place, it is, I think, inconvenient that no order of reference was drawn up. The reference to the master can only be made by consent of the parties (Order XIV., r. 7). In the case before me there was some uncertainty as to whether such consent was given. I think that consent was sufficiently expressed; but there ought to be no doubt in the matter. The master should explain to parties that he can only make such an order by consent, and this equally so whether it be in a town or a country case. Moreover, the word "adjournment" is not correct. There should be an order drawn up, and it should recite that it was made by consent. In the second place, I do not think the master has power to extend the twenty-one days allowed for obtaining judgment under Order XIV., with High Court costs. The statutory power under sect. 116 of the County Courts Act 1888 is given only to a judge: (see Cox v. Hill, 67 L. T. Rep. 26). I find the masters are entirely in accord as to this; and it is right to say that in this case the master has not purported to extend the time. This being so, and judgment not having been obtained within the twenty-one days, costs of the action, as distinct from the costs of the reference, must be on the County Court scale. Here the master has given a lump sum for those costs under Order LXV., r. 27, sub-r. 38, and the scale given under the practice rules for High Court costs under Order XIV., where the sum recovered is over 20*l.* and under 50*l.* I am far from saying that the master was wrong in giving a fixed sum. On the contrary, it seems to me the best thing to do, and it would be absurd to make out a hypothetical County Court bill of costs. But, as the scale is to be County Court and not High Court, I think (as the master points out) special regard should be paid to Order LXV., r. 12, and it seems to me that the fixed sum should be less than the High Court fixed sum. I have no reason to suppose that the master was professing to arrive at probable County Court costs; and though I was told that the difference would not be great, it was admitted that the County Court costs would be rather less. I propose in this case to save the expense of a further inquiry, and reduce this 7*l.* to 5*l.* 10*s.* The particular figure is not to be a precedent, and I should hope that the masters may arrive at some fixed sum for future occasions. Then as to the costs of the reference. Treating this, as I must, as a reference by consent, I think the case is governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Street v. Street (82 L. T. Rep. 648; (1900) 2 Q. B. 57). The master is to be deemed an arbitrator, and he has the same discretion as to costs, including the power to certify for High Court costs as an arbitrator has. The judgment, therefore, in this respect must stand. I have made a slight variation in favour of the defendant, the appellant, and I think, as I have pointed out, that he may have been somewhat prejudiced by the informal mode in which the matter was submitted to the master. In the main, however, the plaintiffs, the respondents, hold what they have got. There should be no costs of the appeal.

WORDSLEY BREWERY COMPANY (apps.) v. HALFORD (resp.). (a)

Landlord and tenant—Tenancy—Grant of lease during tenancy—Notice to quit by original landlord—Validity.

A landlord who, during the currency of a yearly tenancy, grants a lease of the premises to a third person, cannot, during the term granted by such lease, give the yearly tenant notice to quit.

CASE stated on an information by the appellants to recover possession of certain premises, known as New Inns, Alveley, in the occupation of the respondent.

The owner of the New Inns, Alveley, was a Mrs. Ann Whiting, and the respondent had been a yearly tenant under her of the premises at the yearly rent of 15*l.* payable half yearly, the tenancy being a Lady Day take.

During the continuance of this tenancy, by an indenture dated the 4th March 1902 Mrs. Ann Whiting granted to the appellants a lease of the New Inns for the term of fourteen years, commencing on the 25th March 1902, at the yearly rent of 20*l.*, payable half yearly.

At the time the lease was executed, and at the request of the appellants a notice in writing addressed to the respondent was signed by Thomas Whiting, as agent on behalf of his wife Ann Whiting, to quit and deliver up possession of the New Inns on the 25th March 1903, the date of such notice being at the time left blank.

The notice was without any alteration or addition, except the date, served on the respondent on the 4th Sept. 1902, and was dated on that day.

In July 1902 the appellants made application to the respondent to pay to them a quarter's rent up to the 24th June 1902 (reckoned from the previous 25th March), but the respondent declined to do so, alleging that no rent was then due.

The respondent, on the application of the appellants, did, in Oct. 1902, pay them the half year's rent up to the previous 29th Sept.

The respondent also, in April 1903, paid to the appellants a half year's rent up to the 25th March.

Objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that the notice to quit was void and of no effect, and it was contended on the part of the respondent that as such notice was not served prior to the commencement of the lease, it should have been given by or on behalf of the appellants who were the persons entitled to immediate reversion in the premises.

It was contended on the part of the appellants that, although Mrs Ann Whiting had granted them a lease of the New Inns, it did not affect the yearly tenancy in the premises of the respondent, and that until the respondent attorned tenant to them they could not give him notice to quit, distrain for rent, or act as his landlords, and that therefore the proper person to give the notice to quit was Mrs. Ann Whiting, and by the subsequent payment of rent by the respondent to the appellants, he became their tenant, and they were entitled to adopt the notice which was running.

The justices being of opinion that Mrs. Ann Whiting having granted a lease of the premises to the appellants, could not give a valid notice to quit, dismissed the application.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I do not think that we can say that the decision of the justices was wrong. The present respondent was a tenant from year to year of Mrs. Whiting, and during such tenancy she granted a lease for fourteen years to the appellants. The husband as agent for Mrs. Whiting at the time the lease was executed signed a notice to quit addressed to the respondent, but that was not dated and served until September. If by any rule of law the lessor of the appellants is entitled to be treated as the landlord of the respondent, then that notice to quit would be good. It seems to me that the real question is whether or not under these circumstances the assignee of the reversion is bound to give the notice to quit, or whether such assignee can avail himself of the notice given on behalf of his lessor. I think in this court the law is in favour of the contention adopted in the court below. I think that the case of Doe v. Brown (2 El. & Bl. 331) is binding upon us. That case says that where a party entitled to a remainder in tail expectant upon the determination of a life estate grants a term of years to commence immediately, the grantee without entry takes an immediate vested estate carved out of the remainder, the statute 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 9, making the conveyance as effectual as if attornment had been made by the tenant of the particular estate. The grant of the lease, therefore, passes the reversion, and not merely the attornment. Lord Campbell, C.J. in his judgment, says: "The effect of this doctrine with regard to leases carved out of the reversion or remainder is very distinctly stated in Bac. Abr. Tit. Leases (N) (vol. 4, p. 846, 7th edit.). If the grantees of such leases could not obtain an attornment, they might at their election treat the grant as an interesse termini; but where they obtained the attornment the grant operated as a conveyance of so much of the reversion. The statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 9, now makes all grants of manors or rents, or of the reversion or remainder of any messuages, effectual to all intents and purposes without any attornment of the tenants of the manors or of the lands out of which the rents shall be issuing, or of the particular tenants upon whose estates any such reversions or remainders shall and may be expectant or depending as if their attornment had been had and made." Parke, B. in Harmer v. Bean (3 C. & K. 307) said: "It appears that all the rent was paid up to Michaelmas 1851, and the plaintiff is entitled to receive for all rents due after that till Midsummer 1852; for we find that in Aug. 1852 the plaintiff granted a lease under seal of this property to Mr. Ford for twenty-one years, and in consequence of this being done the reversion was transferred to Mr. Ford, and the plaintiff cannot recover for any of this rent due afterwards." It is said that some authorities are inconsistent with that view, and to some extent they may be, but, even if that is so, we have to choose between them all. We must hold that the reversion passed, and the appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS (app.) v. GROCOTT (resp.). (a)

Registration of voters—Declaration by lodger claimant—Evidence—Personal attendance of claimant—Rateable value of house—Character of street—Parliamentary Voters Registration Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18)—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26).

A revising barrister by personal inspection satisfied himself that certain houses were very poor and small, and that it was very doubtful whether any lodgings in those houses were worth 10l. a year unfurnished.

J. duly sent in his claim as a lodger with his declaration attached. It was proved that the rateable value of the house, which was stated to be in as poor a street as any the revising barrister had inspected, was only 14l. per annum, which was 6s. less than J. claimed to pay as lodger. The revising barrister adjourned the hearing of the objection to J.'s claim, and sent him the following notice: ". . . your claim to vote as a lodger has been objected to . . . your claim will or may be disallowed unless you produce or cause to be produced to me . . ."

your rent-book or other sufficient evidence that your said lodgings are of the clear yearly value of 10*l.* if let unfurnished." J. did not attend or make any communication, and his claim was disallowed.

Held, that, as the revising barrister did not make the allowance of the claim dependent upon J.'s personal attendance, the court could not interfere, as there was evidence to support his decision.

A revising barrister cannot make the personal attendance of a claimant a condition of the allowance of his vote.

The right of a revising barrister to disallow a claim, when a claimant has by his declaration given prima facie evidence of his qualification, is not confined to the case of such prima facie proof of the ground of objection as is described in sect. 28 (10) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878, but he may act on other evidence.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

The report of the revising barrister for the borough of Hackney to the court was as follows:

1. The claim of William Jenkins, of 8, Ada-street, Hackney, to vote as an old lodger was duly objected to, on the ground that his lodgings were not of the clear yearly value of 10*l.* or upwards, if let unfurnished. I disallowed the said claim, because the claimant failed to satisfy me that his said lodgings were of such yearly value. I was therefore asked to state a case by way of appeal on the ground that I had no power to disallow the said claim, but I declined to do so.

2. The claim of the said William Jenkins stands by itself, and is not, as suggested in the affidavit dated the 15th Oct. 1903 of Mr. Southerton, a test case, and, if I was wrong in disallowing the said claim, no other claim will be affected.

3. I do not propose to notice in detail the statements contained in the affidavit of the said Mr. Southerton and of the said William Jenkins, but I am unable to accept as accurate the statement contained in par. 2 of the affidavit of the former. I therefore think it right to state as briefly as possible the course I adopted, and my reason for it.

4. Towards the end of the revision of the lists for South Hackney in the year 1902, the town clerk (who performs the duties of the overseers for the purpose of registration) drew my attention to the excessive expense that, as he alleged, was being cast upon the rates owing to the party agents combining to place upon the register all lodger claimants, whether they possessed the necessary qualification in point of value or not. He alleged that I was admitting the claims of thousands of persons who had no qualification. As a matter of fact, no objections on the ground of want of value were made by either agent.

5. On my inquiring into the matter, it was admitted by the party agents that an agreement existed between them to refrain from objecting on the ground of want of value, and to place all lodger claimants on the register, whether they possessed the necessary qualification in value or not.

6. I publicly expressed my disapproval of this practice, and stated that, if reappointed for the present year, I should insist on proof of value. Thereupon the Liberal agent—the deponent Mr. Southerton—stated that, if I did so, I should disfranchise thousands of voters. I regarded this statement as an admission that the town clerk's allegations are substantially correct.

7. I was appointed revising barrister for the current year in the month of July last. Shortly afterwards I directed the town clerk to note in my lists against the name of every lodger claimant the rateable value of the house in which he occupied lodgings, and to supply the same information to the party agents. This was accordingly done.

8. On or about the 6th Aug. 1903 I received from the town clerk a letter asking me to fix some limit of rateable value below which I would refuse to allow a lodger claim. I declined to lay down any hard-and-fast rule based on rateable value, but wrote the letter a copy of which is contained in the exhibit to the affidavit of the said Mr. Southerton. I subsequently satisfied myself, on referring to the authorities, that I was not at liberty to treat rateable value as conclusive in any case.

9. On the 10th Sept. 1903 I opened the registration court for the borough of Hackney. The lists for South Hackney were not reached until the 15th Sept.

10. On or about the 14th Sept. I made a personal inspection of the larger part of the south division, accompanied by the borough registration officer, who had known the constituency for twenty years and had until lately been the Liberal agent for it. The result of my inspection was that I was satisfied that the character of the constituency was very poor and the houses very small, many streets consisting entirely of houses that were little better than hovels, and that consequently the question whether or not any particular lodgings were worth 10*l.* a year unfurnished was extremely doubtful.

11. On beginning to revise the lists for South Hackney on the 15th Sept., I found that the number of new lodger claims was 1014 less than last year, owing mainly to the Conservative agent having fallen in with the views I then expressed. He had also objected to several hundreds of the Liberal claims on the ground of want of value. No objections on this ground were made by the Liberal agent.

12. On the same day the claim of William Jenkins was one of the first three objected to. The Conservative agent stated that there was insufficient value. I had not personally visited Ada-street, and therefore asked the registration officer to state what the character of that street was. He said, "It is as poor a street as any you have seen, sir."

13. It was proved to my satisfaction that the rateable value of the whole house in which William Jenkins occupied lodgings is 14*l.* per annum, or 6*s.* less than the rent which in his claim he stated he paid. I then followed my usual practice in the case of disputed lodger claims, which is as follows:

14. I treat the declaration annexed to the claim (but not the claim itself) as prima facie evidence, and, unless there is evidence in support of the objection, I allow the claim. If, however, the objector is able to raise a reasonable doubt, I hold that the prima facie evidence in favour of the qualification is displaced, and that the claimant must attend and prove his claim. I have the less difficulty in treating the prima facie evidence as rebutted in South Hackney than elsewhere, because it is apparent on the face of the claims, and was expressly admitted by both political agents during this revision, that, in the case of old and new lodgers alike, the agents fill in all particulars, including the amount of rent, in the form of claim and declaration before it is sent to the claimant for signature. The result is that the evidence afforded by the declaration is, in my opinion, highly unsatisfactory in the majority of cases.

15. The Liberal agent, though he had made no objections on the ground of value as already stated, called my attention to certain new lodger claims put forward by the Conservative agent, which he alleged to be bad for want of value, basing his contention on the rateable value of the respective houses.

16. I ordered all the objections on the ground of value and all the claims so questioned by Mr. Southerton to stand over till the evening sitting of my court on the 18th Sept. The first part of the schedule hereto contains a statement respecting lodger claimants during the present year in South Hackney, considered in relation to the rateable value of the houses in which they respectively live. Such statement was prepared for my information by the town clerk, and was had in evidence before me.

JENKINS (app.) v. GROCOTT (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

17. On the said 15th Sept., being of opinion that there were grave doubts as to value in the case of all the claims and objections referred to in pars. 15 and 16 of this report, I gave to each claimant a notice in writing, a copy of which forms the exhibit "W. J. 3" to the affidavit of the said William Jenkins. I stated in court that if such claimants respectively satisfied me that they paid rent amounting to 10l. per annum, or that their lodgings were of the necessary value, I should allow their claims, but not otherwise.

18. At the evening sitting held on the 18th Sept. some sixty claimants attended, and by production of their rent-books or other sufficient evidence satisfied me that they actually paid the rent stated in their claims, or, at any rate, rent amounting to 10l. per annum or upwards. A few other claimants who were unable to attend wrote letters to the same effect, which I accepted as evidence. I allowed the claims of all the above. William Jenkins and some hundreds of other claimants neither attended nor wrote, nor was any explanation of their absence given. I disallowed their claims on the ground that they had respectively failed to satisfy me that they had occupied lodgings of the necessary value.

19. The deponent Mr. Southerton thereupon requested me to state a case by way of appeal in the case of William Jenkins alone, and handed me a written notice of appeal which is contained in the second part of the schedule hereto.

20. Having regard to the provisions of sects. 42 and 65 of the Parliamentary Registration Act 1843, and to the remarks of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in a recent case (Hambridge v. Campbell, Lawson, 1893, p. 348), I thought I ought not to state a case.

21. Moreover, I was of opinion that by stating a case I should be throwing doubt upon the existence of the power of the revising barrister to require the personal attendance of the claimant in a case where the prima facie evidence of the claimant is displaced, and where there is, in addition, reason to suspect, as I suspected, the prevalence of a wholesale manufacture of unequalled votes. The overseers do not exercise the same supervision in the case of lodger claimants as they exercise in the case of other claimants, and, indeed, have been advised by counsel that they have no power to incur any expenses in investigating lodger claims. Practically the only check upon such a manufacture as I have indicated is the power already referred to of the revising barrister, and I was unwilling to disparage it. I therefore declined to state a case unless directed to do so by this honourable court.

22. I may add that on the evidence now before this court I should have had no hesitation in allowing the claim of the said William Jenkins. It is to be observed, however, that no explanation is given why such evidence was not brought before me.

PART II.

Addendum to Report.

14A. In case the court should see fit to review my practice, as stated in par. 14 of the foregoing report, I desire to amplify the said paragraph. The question is generally raised by the objector tendering hearsay evidence in support of his objection. For example, the objector says: "The claimant does not occupy solely, but jointly with his brother. I have seen his brother, who says so"; or, again, "He does not pay 4s. a week, but only 3s. His landlord told me so." In all such cases I hold that the recent case of Dalglish v. Dodds (1894, 22 R. 198) precludes me from disallowing the claim on hearsay evidence, but I think I am justified in saying that the claimant must attend and prove his claim. I therefore adjourned the matter to the evening sitting, giving the claimant notice as in the case under appeal, or summoning him to attend pursuant to sect. 36 of the Registration Act 1878, in most cases issuing a notice rather than a summons as being less oppressive. Sect. 23, sub-sects. 10 and 11, of the same Act seems to render the giving of the notice unnecessary, but I consider it fairer to give it.

By the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 23:

(10) If the objector so appears, the revising barrister shall require him, unless he is an overseer, to prove that he gave the notice or notices of objection required by law to be given by him and to give prima facie proof of the ground of objection, and for that purpose may himself examine and allow the objector to examine the overseers or any other person on oath touching the alleged grounds of objection, and, unless such proof is given to his satisfaction, shall, subject as herein and otherwise by law provided, retain the name of the person objected to. An objection made under this Act by overseers shall be deemed to cast upon the person objected to the burden of proving his right to be on the list. The prima facie proof shall be deemed to be given by the objector if it is shown to the satisfaction of the revising barrister, by evidence, repute, or otherwise, that there is reasonable ground for believing that the objection is well founded, and that by reason of the person objected to not being present for examination, or for some other reason, the objector is prevented from discovering or proving the truth respecting the entry objected to.

(11) If such proof is given by the objector as herein prescribed, or if the objection is by overseers, then unless the person objected to appears by himself, or by some person on his behalf, and proves that he was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list in respect of the qualification described in such list, the revising barrister shall expunge the name of the person objected to.

Robson, K.C. and E. Lewis Thomas for the appellant.

Sutton for the respondent.

Dec. 21.—KENNEDY, J. read the following written judgment of the court:—The material facts appearing in the special case are these: The claimant duly sent in his declaration annexed to his statement of claim. This was under the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 23, prima facie evidence of his qualification. The claimant was objected to on the ground that the lodgings were of insufficient value. The South Hackney list came on for revision in the Registration Court on the 15th Sept. Before that date the revising barrister had made a personal inspection of the larger part of South Hackney with the borough registration officer, who had known the constituency for twenty years. He satisfied himself, he states, that the character of the constituency was very poor, and the houses very small, many streets consisting entirely of houses which were little better than hovels, and that consequently the question whether or not any particular lodgings were worth 10*l.* a year unfurnished was an extremely doubtful one. Upon the claim of Jenkins being opposed by the Conservative agent, the registration officer, in answer to a question of the revising barrister, stated that Ada-street was as poor a street as any which the revising barrister had inspected, and it was proved to the satisfaction of the revising barrister that the rateable value of the whole house in which Jenkins lodged was only 14*l.* per annum; that is, 6*s.* less than the amount of the rent which Jenkins in his claim stated to have been paid by him for the lodgings on which his title to be a voter depended. The town clerk, at the request of the revising barrister, had prepared a statement in regard to lodger claimants considered in relation to the rateable value of the houses in which they lodged, and this was also put in evidence. The statement appears in the schedule to the case. The relevant point in it appears to be that no less than 317 lodger claims were like that of Jenkins in respect of lodgings in houses of a rateable value less than 14*l.* per annum, and that in the case of fifty-three claims there were instances of two lodgers claiming in respect of a house whose rateable value ranged from 9*l.* to 20*l.* The revising barrister knew, from the statement of the party agents in the previous year, that they had by agreement then abstained from opposition to lodger claims. In the present year objection was made by the Conservative agent in numerous cases on the ground of insufficiency of value, and to the claim of Jenkins amongst others. The revising barrister ordered all these cases of objection to stand over until the evening sitting of the 18th Sept., stating in court that if the claimants respectively satisfied him that they paid rent amounting to 10*l.* per annum, or that their respective lodgings were of the prescribed value, he would allow the claims, but that otherwise he would not allow them. He also gave to each claimant a notice in writing, which, in the case of Jenkins, ran thus: "To Mr. William Jenkins, of 8, Ada-street, N.E. Take notice that your claim to vote as a lodger has been objected to on the ground that your lodgings are not of the clear yearly value of 10*l.*, if let unfurnished. Your claim will, or may, be disallowed unless you produce, or cause to be produced, to me, at the evening sitting of my court, commencing at 6.30 p.m., on Friday, the 18th Sept. 1903, your rent-book, or other sufficient evidence that your said lodgings are of the clear yearly value of 10*l.* or upwards, if let unfurnished." On the 18th Sept., according to the case, Jenkins did not attend. He sent no letter or other communication. No explanation of this absence was given. The revising barrister disallowed the claim. These being the facts, the appellant contends that the decision was wrong in a point of law necessary to the decision of the case according to the Registration Act of 1843, s. 42. The same statute provides that there could be no appeal on a question of fact only, or upon the admissibility or effect of any evidence or admission adduced or made in any case to establish any matter of fact only. The points of law put forward by the appellant are two. He says, first, that the revising barrister improperly made the personal appearance of the claimant a condition of his allowance of the claim; secondly, that the claimant having by his declaration given that which by the express terms of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878, s. 23, was prima facie evidence of his qualification, and the objector not having given, it is contended, that which is deemed to be prima facie proof of objection under sect. 28, sub-sect. 10, of the same statute, the revising barrister was not in point of law entitled to require of the claimant what he did require by his oral notice given in court on the 15th Sept., and by the notice of the same date sent to the claimant in writing, and upon the claimant's failure to comply with these requirements to disallow the claim. As to the first point, we are clearly of opinion that if a revising barrister in such a case as the present made the personal attendance of a claimant a condition of the allowance of his vote, he would be doing that which the law does not authorise. No statutory sanction for such a requirement was cited to us, and we are aware of none. The only way in which the claimant's personal attendance can be compelled is under the provisions of sect. 38, which empowers the revising barrister by summons under his hand to require any person to attend and give evidence or produce documents. Sect. 28, sub-sect. 11, to which we shall refer presently, makes sufficient the appearance of the claimant "by himself or by some person on his behalf." In commenting upon this enactment, Mr. Rogers, in the 16th edition of his work, at p. 322, speaks of the words as dispensing with the necessity of personal attendance of the person objected to, if he is represented by some one in court. "But, of course," he adds, "the absence of a person objected to will in some cases weigh with the revising barrister in deciding as to the facts of the case." If in this case the revising barrister could be shown to have made the allowance of the claimant's vote dependent upon his compliance with a requirement of personal attendance, and had disallowed the claim because the claimant did not personally appear, we should be of opinion that his decision could not be supported. But, as we understand the facts, although the revising barrister seems by the statements of pars. 14 and 21 of the special case to have entertained a mistaken opinion on this point of the personal appearance in court, it appears to us to be the fair interpretation of the special case and of the exhibit "W. J. 3," which we have already cited, that he did not disallow this vote or intimate either by his statement in court or by the written notice that he would disallow it on the ground of the failure of the claimant to appear personally on the 18th Sept. He gave notice that he should require certain evidence to support the claim; but neither orally nor by notice did he insist upon the personal attendance of the claimant; in fact, as the case tells us, in some cases where claimants were unable to attend, he accepted as sufficient evidence letters written by them to him stating that they had paid rent sufficient to satisfy the statutory standard of qualification. We desire to express our view that the statute does not make personal attendance absolutely necessary; such a requirement might entail serious hardship in the case of these lodger claimants who, to a very large extent, form part of a very poor class which could ill afford to bear the loss of time involved in personal attendance at the proceedings of the revising barrister's court. We now pass to the second point made by the appellant, that the provisions of sect. 28, sub-sect. 10, have not been complied with. In our view this contention rests upon an erroneous conception of the meaning and intent of this enactment. It is not intended by the Legislature, in our view, absolutely to confine the right of the revising barrister to disallow a claim when the claimant has, by his declaration, given prima facie evidence of his qualification to the case of such prima facie proof of the ground of objection as is there described. Sect. 28, sub-sect. 10, deals only with one special method of establishing a prima facie case against the claim, and then in sub-sect. 11 goes on to say that in case of such prima facie proof of objection being given, the revising barrister shall (not may) expunge the name of the person objected to unless the person objected to appears by himself, or by some person on his behalf, and proves his title to inclusion in the list of voters. The section does not prevent the revising barrister from considering, and, if he thinks it just, giving effect to a decision adverse to the claim to any proper evidence against the claim. If, to take a single example, the objector, in order to meet the prima facie evidence afforded by the claimant's declaration, at once called the landlord or produced the lodger's rent-book, and by this evidence proved that the rent paid was much below the statutory standard, the revising barrister would, in our view, clearly be entitled in point of law to say that if the matter stood there he had evidence which entitled him to reject the claim. As to the weight of such evidence, and the proper effect to be given to it, he is the constituted judge, and no appeal lies from his decision. Sect. 28, sub-ss. 10 and 11, merely enacts in substance that if the objector's prima facie proof of the ground of objection is made out in a particular way, then, unless it is rebutted in a particular way, the revising barrister must disallow the claim. If the objector's case does not satisfy sect. 28, sub-s. 10, it still may consist of evidence against the claim which the revising barrister is entitled to weigh, and may give (and ought to give) effect to if he thinks it weight is sufficient to outweigh the prima facie evidence of the claimant's declaration, and any other evidence confirmatory of the declaration which the claimant may think proper to adduce. In this case the revising barrister had on one side the declaration, and on the other side the rating of the house with information as to the character of the street in which it was situated. The rating was not necessarily conclusive evidence against the claim; it was evidence only, as the court pointed out, in regard to the valuation roll in Kellie v. Little, reported in Lawson's Registration Cases 1894-1897, at p. 132; and the revising barrister decided to give the claimant the chance, if he wished to take it, of "producing or causing to be produced" at a later sitting of the court evidence either by his rent-book or otherwise in support of the declaration. Many other claimants in the like position availed themselves of the chance, and succeeded; this claimant did not do so; and the revising barrister, in this state of things, held adversely to the claim. He had to decide what effect he ought to give to the evidence pro and con; and even if the court could, upon the same evidence, have decided otherwise, it has no power to overrule his decision.

Appeal dismissed.

RAVEN AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. SOUTHAMPTON JUSTICES (resps.). (a)

Licensing—Objection to licence—Not required—Evidence.

On an appeal to quarter sessions against the refusal of licensing justices to grant the renewal of a licence on the ground that the licence was not required in the locality or neighbourhood, evidence was given by a surveyor, who produced an Ordnance Survey map, that within a certain radius of the licensed house objected to there were a large number of licensed houses and beerhouses, that for ten years the house in question had been licensed, and the neighbourhood, which was thickly populated, had not altered except that the population had increased. It was also proved that the neighbourhood was troublesome to the police.

The objection to the licence had been served by the direction of the licensing justices.

Held (dissentiente Kennedy, J.), that there was no evidence justifying the quarter sessions in refusing to grant the renewal of the licence.

CASE stated by quarter sessions on an appeal against a refusal by the respondents to renew the licence of certain licensed premises called the George and Henry.

The only ground of objection in the notice, given and served by the direction of the respondents, was "that the licence is not required in the locality and neighbourhood."

It was proved by the assistant borough surveyor, W. H. Killick, who produced an Ordnance Survey map marked in colour, that, taking the George and Henry as the centre of a circle of 100 yards radius, there were within the circle two fully licensed houses and seventeen beerhouses; with the same centre and 200 yards as radius there were within this limit twelve fully licensed houses and thirty-seven beerhouses; with the same centre and 300 yards as radius there were within this limit twenty-five fully licensed houses and forty-seven beerhouses.

No notice of objection had been served upon any of the houses or beerhouses prior or subsequent to the annual licensing meeting.

For at least ten years the locality and neighbourhood was very thickly populated, and during the whole of that time the George and Henry had been a fully licensed house and the character of the locality and neighbourhood had not altered except that the population had increased.

In addition, it was stated by a detective in the borough police that the neighbourhood was a troublesome one to the police, and he corroborated the last witness.

No further evidence was adduced by the respondents.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, although the map and facts so proved might be some evidence that there were too many licensed houses in the locality and neighbourhood, yet there was nothing to indicate that the George and Henry was a licence that was not required; and that there was no evidence to support a finding that the licence then held by the appellant George Raven for the sale of excisable and intoxicating liquor at the George and Henry was not required in the locality and neighbourhood.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the map and facts so proved as aforesaid were evidence upon which the quarter sessions could find and were evidence to support a finding that the licence was not required, and, although such evidence did not differentiate the George and Henry from the other licensed houses in the neighbourhood, yet, if it was necessary to so differentiate, weight should be given to the fact that the notice of objection had been served by direction of the respondents, who had local knowledge and could therefore and had in fact differentiated between the licensed houses.

The quarter sessions upheld the contention of the respondents and found that the George and Henry licensed house was not required for the wants of the neighbourhood, and accordingly dismissed the appeal.

Avory, K.C. (Temple Cooke and S. H. Emanuel with him) for the appellants.—There was no evidence here which justified the justices in refusing the licence. The notice was given here under sect. 42 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), the same section under which notice was given in Rez v. Farnham Justices; Ex parte Smith (86 L. T. Rep. 839; sub nom. Rez v. Howard, (1902) 2 K. B. 363), but there the notices of objection had been served on all the licence-holders in the district. Mere evidence that there are numerous houses in a particular area is no evidence that a particular house is not required. [KENNEDY, J.—Have the justices the same power when a renewal of a licence is asked for as when a first application for a new licence is made? No. There is a large distinction between the two matters. On an application for a new licence the justices may say that there are enough licensed houses already, but no objection can be taken to a renewal unless a notice has been given and the provisions of sect. 42 of the Licensing Act 1872 complied with. He referred to

A licence must be renewed unless there is some cause for refusing it. He referred to

Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42;
Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.

Lord Hannen in Sharpe v. Wakefield (sup.) said: "The object of the 26th section of the Act of 1874 appears to be to enforce this duty" [i.e., to consider each individual case on its own special merits] "and to require the justices to particularise the special ground on which they consider the personal attendance of the applicant necessary. The word 'personal' is fully satisfied by construing it as meaning 'for a cause in which the applicant is personally interested and not merely interested as one of the general body of licensed persons.'" The question of the number of houses in a particular area is one in which the general body of licensed persons is interested. It was recognised in Evans v. Conway Justices (82 L. T. Rep. 704; (1900) 2 Q. B. 224) that the quarter sessions must have evidence before them on behalf of the respondents justifying their refusal to renew. That evidence must be given by the respondents, and the quarter sessions cannot act on the fact that the local justices have refused the application to renew. Smith, L.J. in this case says: "And it has been held by Hannen and Quain, J.J. that the requirements of this section [sect. 42 of the Licensing Act 1872] apply equally to the Court of Quarter Sessions when a publican appeals thereto against the refusal of the licensing justices to renew his licence as to a licensing meeting: (Ruddick v. Justices of Liverpool, 42 J. P. 406)." The authority of Evans v. Conway Justices (sup.) was recognised in Rez v. Farnham Justices (sup.).

C. Tyrell Giles (Bassett with him) for the respondents.—In a case of this kind the justices may use their local knowledge. There is no evidence that the matter was not thoroughly gone into by the quarter sessions, but, on the contrary, the evidence is all the other way. There was the map, the police evidence, and the local knowledge of the justices, and there is abundant evidence to support the findings.

Avory, K.C. in reply.

Dec. 21.—KENNEDY, J.—In this case I have been asked to deliver my own judgment first, as I have the great misfortune to differ from my Lord and my brother Lawrance as to the result of the application. I need not say that, in delivering this judgment with the consciousness that I have the misfortune not to have their concurrence, I feel the greatest possible doubt as to the correctness of my own view; but I feel that, having formed an opinion, I ought all the more to give fully my reasons for the view which I take. In this case the Court of Quarter Sessions have affirmed the refusal of the respondents to grant the renewal of the licence to the George and Henry public-house, in Orchard-lane, Southampton. George Raven is the tenant. Crawley and Co. are the owners of this house. The ground of objection was that the licence was not required in the locality and neighbourhood. On the hearing of the appeal the respondents, according to the proper and universal practice on the hearing of such an appeal, began. They called William Henry Killick, the assistant borough surveyor, and John Neish, a detective in the borough police. Killick proved that, if the George and Henry were taken as the centre of a circle of 100 yards radius, there were within that circle two fully licensed houses and seventeen beerhouses; and if the circle were enlarged so as to have a radius of 300 yards, there would be included within it no less than twenty-five fully licensed houses and forty-seven beerhouses. The same witness stated no notice of objection had been served in regard of any of these other houses; that the neighbourhood was thickly peopled; and that the character of the people had remained the same while its numbers had increased in the course of the last ten years, during the whole of which period the appellant had held a licence. The witness produced an Ordnance map to illustrate his figures and distances, and to show the site both of the George and Henry and of all the other licensed houses within the area to which his evidence related by means of marks and circles drawn upon the map. The witness Neish corroborated Killick, and further testified that the neighbourhood was a troublesome one to the police. The appellants thereupon called their witnesses, but neither their names nor the nature of their evidence appear in the special case. The court, as appears on the face of the order of the Court of Quarter Sessions, after hearing, as their statement shows, the evidence and argument of counsel on both sides, affirmed the decision of the licensing justices, and refused the renewal of the licence subject to the opinion of this court upon the point intended to be raised by the statement of this special case. The point is, in substance, that the quarter sessions had not any evidence before them to support their finding that the licence of the George and Henry was not required in the locality and neighbourhood. If there was such evidence, of course we cannot overrule their decision on the appeal. Now, what was the evidence? As it stood it was evidence, first, of the locality of the George and Henry; it was evidence of that which they were bound to consider, a large superfluous number of licensed houses within the area. The position of those houses was before them. The position of the George and Henry in relation both to those houses and to the neighbourhood was before them. In my judgment it is impossible to say that the state of the locality and neighbourhood, and the other matters to which I referred as appearing in the evidence of Killick and Neish in regard to the throng of inns and beerhouses, and the evidence which I have mentioned as to the position of the George and Henry in regard to all those public-houses and to the neighbourhood, did not afford any evidence which legally entitled the Court of Quarter Sessions, acting, of course, judicially, as they are bound, to act as they did in affirming the decision of the licensing justices, and refusing to renew this licence. As I understand the effect of the judgment of the House of Lords in Sharpe v. Wakefield (64 L. T. Rep. 180; (1891) A. C. 173), both justices at the licensing meeting, dealing, of course, with each case as it arises upon its merits and exercising their discretion, but exercising it, as Lord Halsbury, L.C. pointed out, judicially, and also the Court of Quarter Sessions on appeal, exercising also, of course, its discretion judicially and subject to their position, which, as it must be held since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Evans v. Conway Justices (82 L. T. Rep. 704; (1900) 2 Q. B. 224), is a court of justice, and upon legal evidence are entitled to refuse to renew a licence if they are of opinion that the public-house to which it relates is not required for the wants of the neighbourhood. To my mind there can be no question that the sworn evidence in the present case, with the justifiable inference to be drawn from the position of the public-house in relation both to the neighbourhood and to the other public-houses, might be held by this tribunal before which that evidence was adduced to establish the necessary point unless—and this is the gist of the appellants' contention—it is not merely relevant but absolutely essential to the proof that it must be further shown by evidence that there are some better grounds for refusing the renewal of the licence to this house objected to than would be shown to exist in regard to the licence of every other house within the neighbourhood under consideration—for example, objections in respect to convenience of site, or business, or character, or any extent of business done. I think I may say in passing that there was evidence which the justices had before them on the evidence of Killick, supported by the illustration of the map, as to the relative convenience of sites in this case. The argument of the appellants comes to this: Given a locality in which the licensing authority, whether in the first instance or on appeal, is satisfied by proper evidence that there is a needless multitude of licensed houses, the case for the objection to the renewal of some particular licence must be held to fail unless it is established by affirmative evidence that the licence objected to less deserves renewal than the licence of any other of the public-houses which are situate in the same locality. Now, speaking for myself, I know of no authority, either in the licensing statutes or any reported case, which can properly be cited in support of this argument. On the contrary, as I have already said, the law accepts as justification for the refusal to renew a licence the fact that in the opinion of the magistrates exercising a judicial discretion, and exercising it, of course, in regard to the particular case (or the Court of Quarter Sessions acting on legal evidence on the appeal), the renewal of the licence is not required by the locality. It may, I think, properly also be borne in mind in considering the appellants' arguments: Firstly, that to attempt really and satisfactorily to compare upon legal evidence the relative claim to continue of some sixty to seventy licensed houses as against the one house objected to would plainly involve a long, most difficult, and probably in most cases an impracticable inquiry; and, secondly, that direct evidence has been adduced in support of the objection on the ground of the wants of the neighbourhood being over-supplied, as it was done by the respondents in the present case. It would in my humble judgment be more natural and more fair that the burden of counterbalancing the weight of this evidence, by showing the particular house is more useful to the locality and less superfluous than all or even some of the other licensed houses, should lie upon the applicants for the renewal of the licence. In the present case the appellants either did not try or, if they tried, the result shows they did not succeed in proving any of these matters on their own behalf. The learned counsel for the appellants dwelt upon the hardship to the appellant of not renewing a licence without evidence of its uselessness or inconvenience as compared with the other licensed houses in the locality which was under consideration. I agree that unless all the houses are compared on evidence it is possible that what might not unreasonably be deemed a hardship may arise as between the licence of the George and Henry and the licences of all or some of the houses within the area. But no court can be swayed by the possibility of resulting hardship if the law is clear. The amendment of the law is the duty of the Legislature. It may be deemed a hardship that the renewal of a licence may be refused under any circumstances whatever other than for the bad character of the appellant or insufficient character of the premises. The one

duty of all courts is to administer justly the law as it stands; and in my view it is to be borne in mind, when one ponders the appellant's contention, that the main object in proceeding in such a case as the present consists, not in the adjudication of the merits between a number of public-houses, but in adjudicating as to the propriety of the refusal of a licence to a particular house, in regard, of course, to its merits and to the requirements of the neighbourhood. The thing to be decided is whether or not that public-house, owing to the advantages of its situation or of its accommodation or grade, ought to keep its licence in view of the wants of the area in which there are a number of other public-houses. I do not mean to suggest that in coming to a decision the Court of Quarter Sessions may not rightly give heed to such considerations as, for example, the length of time during which a licence has been yearly renewed, or to evidence, if it is given, of the relative superiority of the particular public-house in respect of situation or otherwise as compared with other public-houses in the same locality. But, in dealing with the appellants' contention here, which is that certain evidence is not merely relevant but indispensable before a renewal can justly be refused, it appears to me to be important rightly and accurately to comprehend the nature of that which is after all the real and essential issue. The only other matter, I think, that calls for notice was a subject for discussion at the hearing before us, and is contained in the special case. The paragraph runs thus: "It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the map and facts there proved as aforesaid were evidence on which we could find, and were evidence to support a finding, that the said licence was not required as aforesaid, and, although such evidence did not differentiate the said George and Henry from the other licensed houses in the neighbourhood, yet, if it were necessary so to differentiate, weight should be given to the fact that the said notice of objection had been served as aforesaid by direction of the respondents, who had local knowledge, and could therefore and had in fact differentiated between the said licensed houses." I may say that, as I read the paragraph, it means this: that the appellants here contended that you must do that which I have endeavoured to express—namely, before dealing with this licence, even though you know where it was, show its position in relation to the neighbourhood, and show its position in relation to all the other public-houses referred to in the very narrow area in which they are all so crowded together; you must give evidence to make the case of renewal less desirable in this case as compared with all these other public-houses. And as I read this evidence (and I dwell upon this because I think that my Lord and my brother Lawrance take a different view), I think myself the fair way of reading this case, as it strikes me, is that the justices held that they had sufficient evidence and did not agree with the contention of the appellants that it was necessary to differentiate in the way that I have described, but that, if it was necessary, they thought that they were entitled to look at and consider the fact, which they described there, of the notice of objection having been served by the direction of the local justices. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in Evans v. Conway Justices (sup.), to which I have already referred, by which it was decided that the Court of Quarter Sessions are not entitled to refuse a licence without some evidence to support the objection, decided also in my view inferentially that the tribunal ought to proceed as a court of law with regard to the reception of evidence and the requirements of legal proof. Therefore, although to some extent proceedings before it are not an ordinary litigation, it may perhaps be held to partake of the nature, as my brother Channell in his judgment in the Divisional Court in the same case described it, of an administrative tribunal. I feel considerable doubt whether the Court of Quarter Sessions, in such a case as the present, may at all, or, if at all, to what extent, consider as to the differentiation of the George and Henry from other public-houses in the same locality. If it was necessary to consider this point, the fact that the objection in this case was served by the direction of the justices, who, in the language of the present Master of the Rolls in the case of Rex v. Howard (1902) 2 K. B. 363)—it is more commonly referred to as Rex v. Farnham Justices (86 L. T. Rep. 839) are persons deliberately appointed because from their circumstances they are likely to have local knowledge, might be taken into consideration, but in the view which I have already expressed that the quarter sessions were entitled to decide, as they did, upon the evidence before them, without any evidence to differentiate between the George and Henry and all the other public-houses, it is not necessary to decide this point. There was evidence before the justices which entitled them, in my view, to come to their decision, and we cannot, if there was such evidence, overrule it even if they did have other evidence which they ought to have regarded. I will therefore only say that I am inclined to think that while the origin of the objection to the renewal of the licences could not be treated as itself affording some evidence that the George and Henry was as between itself and the other public-houses—if they could be dealt with together—the one that could best be dispensed with in reference to the wants of the neighbourhood, it does not necessarily follow that the court would be entitled, when considering the worth of a point made by the appellants as to the absence of evidence of comparative merit of the public-houses, wholly to shut out from their consideration that their objection to this renewal did not come from a private or irresponsible objector.

LAWRANCE, J.—Having arrived at a conclusion contrary to that of my brother Kennedy, I will state very shortly and very broadly the grounds which lead up to that conclusion. I think that the magistrates had not before them any evidence which justified them in acting as they did in this case—that is to say, to come to a final determination in this case—for it seems to me impossible to read the case without seeing that the evidence of Neish, the detective, and the other witness who was called—Killick, the surveyor—added nothing whatever to the facts that were already known to the justices with regard to the number of public-houses in the locality. That is to say, they only came, one might say, almost to prove the map and nothing else. The map shows that there was an enormous quantity of public-houses in this district, two within 100 yards of this house fully licensed, and twelve within 200 yards; and it seems to me upon that the magistrates acted without the slightest evidence, none of the evidence given by either of the witnesses called before them having any direct bearing as to the George and Henry public-house licence. Now, it seems to me that what the magistrates are bound to do is to act judicially in the matter. I cannot see how it can be said that the justices acted judicially if they have merely taken, as they did in this case, a prima facie case. No doubt a man acting as a justice who had the management of the public-houses to see there were not too many, and so forth, taking up that map would be justified in saying there are too many public-houses here. Then comes the question, What is the proper way of dealing with it? Not merely taking the map, like a potentate taking a map of Europe and rectifying the map by saying: "I will take this away and I will take that away," and taking away this public-house. They begin with this public-house, against which, as far as I know, not a word was to be said. If there had been, there would have been evidence forthcoming from the two witnesses who were called. But they took that public-house alone and, without any more evidence than the fact that there are two more public-houses close to it and twelve within a very short distance of it, they deprived it of its licence. Now, the question is: Is that acting judicially? It is impossible, of course, to lay down any rule as to what may be done, but it certainly does appear to me that the case of Rex v. Howard (sup.)—the Farnham case—does show what might be done and what, I should have thought, in the interests of justice ought to be done in cases of this kind. What the magistrates did there was this: They formed a committee of their own members, who did inquire into all the respective merits of the different public-houses in the district. They made a report to the justices and the justices acted on that, and they were held by the court to have acted rightly in doing so. The words of the Master of the Rolls seem to me most important in that view: "They were of opinion that the only fair and satisfactory way of dealing with the question was to cause objections to be served on all the owners of licensed houses so that the case of each of them might be formally inquired into, and for this purpose authority was given to the justices' clerk to object to such renewals on the general ground that the houses were not required, and also on special grounds set out in the notice." That gave everybody their opportunity. It gave the magistrates the opportunity of weighing the merits—in other words, of acting judicially in the matter, seeing which of the public-houses could remain and from which licences should be taken. That is one step that might be taken, and it seems to me a reasonable and proper step to be taken, in cases of that kind. Nothing of that kind was done here. All that was done was to act upon the map, taking the map alone—acting upon the fact that there were an enormous quantity of public-houses in the neighbourhood and it was necessary to begin with one of them, and as to that one not any evidence was given. That being so, I think that they did not act judicially in the matter; that they did not hear this case of the public-house on the merits at all, but only the mere fact that it formed one of a large number of public-houses. For that reason I come to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed. I should be very sorry to say one word to tie the hands of justices who are interested in the good work of putting an end to public-houses in overcrowded districts. That is a different matter. I think they must have before them some evidence on which they could act, and it is fair to the owners of the public-houses that they should have some.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I agree with the judgment of my brother Lawrance with one slight exception with regard to the Farnham case, which I will point out; but, as the matter is of very great importance, in view of what is now been said with regard to licences, I think it better to state my reasons. I do not demur in substance from the view of the law which my brother Kennedy has so clearly expressed. Where we part company is in the application of that law in this particular case, and I think it well to state one or two preliminary matters that I assume for the purpose of this judgment. I recognise the justices may of their own motion give notices that licences will be objected to on the ground that a particular licence is not required for this locality. That was a matter which was very much discussed both in the Court of Appeal in the Farnham case and when that case was before us previously, and we held, and the Court of Appeal affirmed the view, that that course might be taken. But it must, of course, be remembered in this particular case the justices, and the justices only, are respondents to this appeal. I further desire to point out that it by no means follows that it is necessary to differentiate between different houses because the justices are going to refuse, or think they ought to refuse, a particular licence on the ground that the licence is not required. There may be circumstances in connection with the character of the house, with its position, its accommodation, or its credit, that would justify the magistrates in thinking that that house, having regard to all its circumstances, is not required in the neighbourhood, and they may act accordingly. We have got to consider whether or not the Court of Quarter Sessions in this case acted as a court upon the evidence that they could lawfully receive, having regard to the objection that was raised by the justices, that objection being in the terms that my brother Kennedy has stated—"that the licence is not required in the locality or neighbourhood." At the risk of a little length (I hope to be absolutely fair to these justices), I wish to read exactly what they have found, and I must say, in the first instance, I presume the justices of the quarter sessions have stated the whole case. If they have not done so, I may be doing injustice to them, but that is their own fault, because they have stated the case on which our opinion is asked, and I must assume that they have given us all the evidence on which they acted. Mr. Giles suggested there was other evidence. All I can say is they ought not to have stated a case for us and asked our opinion unless that case was stated on the whole of the evidence, and that is why I wish to read the paragraph. "Upon the said hearing the following evidence was adduced before us by the respondents. William Henry Killick, the assistant surveyor of the county borough aforesaid, produced an Ordinance

K.B. DIV.] MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF EASTBOURNE v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. [H. OF L.]

Survey map (which is annexed to and is intended to form part of this case) of the locality and neighbourhood of the said George and Henry, upon which map he had marked in colour all the fully licensed houses and beerhouses, and proved that, taking the said George and Henry as the centre of a circle of 100 yards radius, there are within the said circle two fully licensed houses and seventeen beerhouses; with the same centre and 200 yards radius there are within this limit twelve fully licensed houses and thirty-seven beerhouses; with the same centre and 300 yards as radius there are within this limit twenty-five fully licensed and forty-seven beerhouses; and that no notice of objection had been served upon any of the said houses or beerhouses prior or subsequent to the annual licensing meeting; that for at least ten years he had known the said locality and neighbourhood, which was very thickly populated, and during the whole of that time the George and Henry had been a fully licensed house, and that the character of the said locality and neighbourhood had not altered, except that the population had increased. John Neish, a detective in the said county borough police, corroborated the evidence given by the said William Henry Killick, and, in addition, stated that the neighbourhood was a troublesome one to the police, and no further evidence was adduced by the respondents." Now, I take it as the basis of my judgment that it was on that evidence, and that evidence only, the court affirmed the decision of the justices not to renew this licence. Now, having read it, I do not think it is unfair to say, as my brother Lawrance has said, that all that that evidence amounted to was the map, and nothing else. It showed no particulars of the particular house, and it did not even show the surrounding circumstances of the locality of the particular house, its accommodation, or anything to do with it. It was nothing but the map. I think that it is not unimportant to point out that if you look at the map, and speak of it as a map, it at any rate discloses this: that immediately opposite the public-house in the same street, practically opposite—in the same relative position with regard to the house—was another fully licensed house. I mention that, not for the purpose of showing, as I have indicated, it was necessary for the justices to differentiate, but to point out that if they acted upon the map and the map only, as I think they did, it is not very easy to see how, in the absence of evidence about the appellants' house, they could avoid differentiating. I wish to enforce what has been laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Rez v. Howard (sup.). I accept it as binding on me as indicating what is the fair thing to be done. In that case, which was a more difficult one than this, there were a great many houses involved, and the Master of the Rolls says this: "It is clear from their report that they"—that is, the justices—"were of opinion that the only fair and satisfactory way of dealing with the question was to cause objections to be served on all the owners of licensed houses so that the case of each of them might be formally inquired into, and for this purpose authority was given to the justices' clerk to object to such renewals on the general ground that the houses were not required, and also on special grounds set out in the notice. These objections were signed by the clerk, stating that he was acting under the instructions of the justices present at the annual licensing meeting." All I point out is that, in a case much more complicated, the Master of the Rolls at any rate indorses the opinion that the only fair method would be that of having notices served on all the licensed houses. I mention that only for the purpose of showing that, in the absence of circumstances relating to any particular houses, differentiation may be (or comparison rather is the more proper word to use) the only means of fairly dealing with such a question; but I wish again to point out that I do not consider any comparison or differentiation is necessary where there is evidence as to the character of the house in respect of which the licence is refused. Then comes in the one matter which I desire to correct in order that my brother Lawrance's judgment may not create a false impression. In the Farnham case the justices did not act on the report. If they had done so, the judgment would not have been quite what it was. The report had collected facts for the information of the justices, and, that report being used to inform their minds, then they dealt with each case judicially. Now, that being so, I come to the conclusion—and this is where my brother Kennedy and I differ—that this Court of Quarter Sessions had no evidence before them except the map, and, if they did not rely upon the differentiation as contended for by the respondents, then they had no evidence on which they could act. I think it is a very serious thing to lay down a rule that justices at quarter sessions may act on evidence which is not evidence in the literal sense of the word. They must act on evidence, discharging such duties as justices in the quarter sessions in these cases have to discharge. I therefore come to the conclusion that there was before these justices no evidence on which they could properly come to the conclusion that this house was not required for that neighbourhood, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the "property" mentioned in the section means the property authorised by the Act to be purchased, both real and personal, and that ad valorem duty is payable in respect of the value of the whole of the property so purchased, and not only in respect of such part of it as consists of realty.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Stirling and Mathew, L.J.J.), reported 85 L. T. Rep. 745; (1902) 1 K. B. 403, who had affirmed a judgment of the King's Bench Division (Kennedy and Phillimore, J.J.), reported 85 L. T. Rep. 219; (1901) 2 K. B. 773, upon a special case stated by consent in the matter of an information on behalf of the Crown.

The question was whether, upon the purchase by the Eastbourne Corporation of the undertaking of the Eastbourne Electric Light Company Limited, stamp duty was payable under the Finance Act 1895 in respect of the whole purchase money, or only in respect of such part thereof as would in any case require a conveyance in writing. Sect. 12 of the Finance Act 1895 provides as follows:

12. Where, after the passing of this Act, by virtue of any Act, whether passed before or after this Act, either (a) any property is vested by way of sale in any person, or (b) any person is authorised to purchase property, such person shall within three months after the passing of the Act or the date of vesting, whichever is later, or after the completion of the purchase, as the case may be, produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a copy of the Act printed by the Queen's printer of Acts of Parliament or some instrument relating to the vesting in the first case, and an instrument of conveyance of the property in the other case, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property, and in default of such production the duty, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the passing of the Act, date of vesting, or completion of the purchase, as the case may be, shall be a debt to Her Majesty from such person.

On the 19th April 1899 the appellants and the Eastbourne Electric Light Company Limited (who had become the undertakers supplying electricity under the Eastbourne Electric Supply Order 1890) entered into a contract of purchase and sale of that date, which contained the following clauses, amongst others:

Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the company will sell, and the corporation will buy, the whole of the undertaking of the company under the said order, and all the powers, rights, and privileges thereby conferred on the company, together with the full benefit of all pending contracts and engagements to which the company are or may be entitled in connection with the said undertaking, together with the freehold piece of land and the building erected thereon situate in Junction-road, Eastbourne, aforesaid, with all the works, engines, and fixed and movable plant and machinery, wires, cables, pipes, instruments, utensils, tools, and all other the goods, chattels, and effects belonging to the said company, which now are or shall at the time of the completion of the said purchase be used and provided by the company for the purposes of the said undertaking, save and except all depreciation and other reserve funds, cash balances, book and other debts, earnings, rights, and credits belonging or due to the company at the time of such completion, and the company's books and papers and the furniture of their board-room. The purchase shall be completed and the purchase money paid on the 1st day of January, 1900, on which day, subject to the due payment of the said purchase money, the company will convey to the corporation in fee simple, and free from encumbrances, the freehold works and buildings now belonging to the company, subject to and with the benefit of all tenancies of any part or parts of the said premises which now are or then shall be let to or occupied by any tenant or tenants of the company, and also will assign or deliver over to the corporation all the remainder of the premises hereby agreed to be sold.

The contract was sanctioned by the Eastbourne Electric Supply Order 1899, and the purchase has since been carried out. The appellants admitted that the above enactment required them to produce a conveyance of the property in all the subject-matters of the purchase the property in which could not be transferred without a written conveyance, but contended that it did not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise included in the purchase which could be transferred without writing, by delivery. The total purchase money was 88,749*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*, of which 37,929*l.* was admitted by the Crown to have been paid in respect of personal chattels. The courts below decided, in favour of the Crown, that the duty was payable on the whole amount.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Ritchie Macoun appeared for the appellants.

The Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and Rowlatt, for the respondents, were not called on to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: We have had a very long and ingenious argument on this question, which seems to me to be a very plain one. I certainly do not mean to go through all the different and ingenious hypotheses which have been put forward in order to show that the plain words of the Act of Parliament may be cut down and reduced to an absurdity. I think, so far as there is any argument at all, that the whole question turns upon the word "conveyance," and, although with some hesitation, and a considerable amount of circumlocution, the learned counsel has addressed to us what I must admit to be a learned and ingenious argument, it simply comes to this: That the statute is intended in its operation to apply only to land, or what would be equivalent to land in its natural sense. But the whole of that argument seems to depend upon the use of the word "conveyance," which he says only means, according to the technical view of the question, a conveyance of land, or realty in some form, whether it be land or not. My answer to that is that it is not true. The word "conveyance" means what it says. It conveys any property. I find that Wharton, in his Law Lexicon, defines it as "an instrument that transfers property from one person to another." That is all; and although it may be perfectly true to say that where you are dealing with personal property it may pass, and does pass, completely by mere delivery, it is a very illogical consequence of that proposition to suggest that it may not pass in any other way, and that you may not convey it by an ordinary conveyance. I think you may. I think that really disposes of the whole argument. When I look at the statute itself and see what it does, I am content to apply it to the particular facts with which your Lordships have to deal. It seems to me that it would be impossible to say, having regard to the particular facts with which your Lordships have to deal, that the case is not included in the language of the statute. We have heard a great deal about ambiguity, about confusion, and about alternative constructions; but when I apply the language of the statute to the transaction which is engaging our attention, it appears to me to be as clear as possible that in the ordinary natural meaning of the words therein employed, the statute does apply to this transaction. I decline to go into hypotheses about other cases in which it might be supposed that this language would be too wide, and would include something else. It is enough for me to say that, as applicable to this particular transaction the words seem to me to be absolutely clear, without confusion and without any alternative construction at all, and to apply literally and strictly to the transaction in question. For these reasons I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

MACKUSICK v. FLEMING.

Lord MACNAGHTEN: My Lords: I am of the same opinion.

Lord SHAND.—My Lords: I also am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the very purpose of the Act of 1895 was to enlarge the subject of taxation, so that personal property bought by sale should be liable to duty just as heritable property was previously liable. The Act, I think, succeeded in its purpose, and I agree in the opinions of their Lordships in the courts below, and with the Lord Chancellor and Lord Macnaghten, that the judgment must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think that the case becomes absolutely clear if you read the section shortly, leaving out the words which are not applicable to the present case. The section runs thus: "Where (after the passing of this Act), by virtue of any Act (whether passed before or after this Act), any person is authorised to purchase property, any such person shall (within three months after the completion of the purchase) produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an instrument of conveyance of the property"—that is, of the property which the purchaser is authorised by an Act of Parliament to purchase, "duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property." Now, what is that? What is the property of which an instrument of conveyance is to be produced? And what is the property the value of which is to govern the ad valorem stamp? It is obviously the property which the purchaser is authorised by an Act of Parliament to purchase. I think it plain beyond all question that this Act was not intended to affect ordinary purchases made in the ordinary course of business. It was confined, and was intended to be confined, to purchases authorised by some special Act of Parliament, expressly authorised, the property, if not accurately defined, being at all events described in such Act of Parliament. That gets rid of the whole difficulty. There is no ambiguity about it at all. Every word in this section has its natural meaning, and requires no forced construction whatever. The whole fallacy of the argument on behalf of the appellants appears to me to be this: That because personal chattels pass, or can pass, by delivery without any instrument at all, you cannot have an instrument of conveyance for them. That is not the case. In this case the Act of Parliament is addressed to cases where an instrument is required, and, being required, it must be stamped. The little difficulty, if there is any difficulty about it, comes entirely from not seeing that it does not apply to ordinary purchases in the ordinary course of business, but to special purchases, specially authorised.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.), reported under the name of Fleming v. Loe (87 L. T. Rep. 213; (1902) 2 Ch. 359), who had reversed a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., reported 85 L. T. Rep. 480; (1901) 2 Ch. 594, where the facts are fully set out.

On the 16th July 1896, Neill agreed to sell to Loe some mining property in Western Australia.

On the 18th July Loe agreed to sell the property to the appellant Mackusick. This contract was afterwards assigned to the respondent Fleming, and he brought an action against Mackusick and Loe for specific performance. Mackusick pleaded that the contract had been obtained by misrepresentation, and was not binding, and counter-claimed for certain payments made by him under it.

The action failed, and Cozens-Hardy, J. held that Mackusick was entitled to recover on the counter-claim.

Fleming appealed, and the Court of Appeal gave judgment in his favour on the ground that, on the facts and correspondence, Loe was the person really liable. Loe was a person of no means and was dead.

Mackusick appealed to the House of Lords.

Upjohn, K.C. and Robertson appeared for the appellant.

AMYOT v. DWARRIS AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE OF JAMAICA.

Will—Construction—Gift “to the eldest son of my sister”—Intestacy.

A testator by his will made in 1822 devised real estate in strict settlement, and, in the event of the failure of the previous limitations, which happened, “to the eldest son of my sister, F. M. G., and his heirs for ever.” The testator died in 1860. At the date of the will F. M. G. had two sons, both of whom died in the lifetime of the testator intestate and without issue. Two other sons, born after the date of the will, survived the testator. One died intestate and without issue before the failure of the previous limitations. The fourth born son of F. M. G. was her eldest surviving son at the time of the failure of the previous limitations.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that there was an intestacy.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Judicature of Jamaica (in Equity) dated the 1st May 1903 upon a special case agreed by the parties.

The question was as to the proper construction of a devise contained in the will of Sir Fortunatus William Dwarria, deceased, upon the failure or determination of certain limitations therein expressed in favour of the testator's wife and issue, of a plantation and the hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging, hereinafter referred to as Golden Grove, situate in the Island of Jamaica.

The facts of the case are as follows:—

Sir F. W. Dwarria duly made his will, dated the 11th Oct. 1822, and thereby gave and devised Golden Grove subject to certain trusts that were declared by the will of the testator's late father, which may for the purposes of this appeal be deemed to have since been satisfied, to certain trustees for the term of 1000 years from the testator's death, upon trusts which may also for the purposes of this appeal be deemed to have since been satisfied, and subject thereto the testator gave and devised Golden Grove to the use of his eldest son, Fortunatus William Dwarria, for his life, with remainder to the use of trustees to support contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said F. W. Dwarria (the son) successively in tail, with remainder to the use of the testator's second son, Brereton Edward Dwarria, for his life, with remainder to the use of trustees to support contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said B. E. Dwarria successively in tail, with remainder to the use of the testator's third son, Denman Adams Dwarria, for his life, with remainder to the use of trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of the said D. A. Dwarria successively in tail, with remainder to the testator's fourth son, Henry Parr Dwarria, for his life, with remainder to the use of trustees to support contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said H. P. Dwarria successively in tail, with remainder to the use of every other son of the testator by his then wife, Alicia Dwarria (who, in fact, predeceased the testator), or any woman with whom he might intermarry, successively in tail, with remainder to the use of the testator's daughters, Alicia Dwarria and Honoria Dwarria, and every other daughter of the testator by his then wife or any other woman with whom he might intermarry, in equal shares as tenants in common in tail with cross remainders between them in tail, with remainder to the use of the testator's said wife, Alicia Dwarria, for her life, and the testator then proceeded to devise Golden Grove as follows: “And immediately from and after the decease of my said wife to the eldest son of my sister Frances McKeand Gibney and his heirs for ever, he and they taking and bearing the surname of Dwarria, and paying the sum of 500*l.* apiece” to each and every of the persons thereafter mentioned their executors and assigns. The will did not contain any devise of the testator's residuary real estate.

The testator died on the 20th May 1860 without having revoked or altered his will, and letters of administration, with the will annexed, were on the 6th Aug. 1860 granted to one of the testator's daughters out of the principal registry of the Court of Probate. The will was entered in the Record Office in Jamaica on the 23rd May 1900.

All the limitations in the will contained of Golden Grove, in favour of the testator's wife and issue, prior to the limitation in favour of the eldest son of the testator's sister, F. M. Gibney, failed or determined, the last survivor of the testator's children being B. E. Dwarria.

The testator's heir-at-law was his eldest son, F. W. Dwarria, who died intestate on the 22nd Jan. 1876.

B. E. Dwarria (who was the heir-at-law of his brother, F. W. Dwarria) died on the 10th May 1901, having by his will, dated the 10th Aug. 1895, appointed the appellant and the Rev. Anthony Johnson (who died on the 6th Sept. 1903) his executors and trustees. The will was proved by the appellant and the Rev. A. Johnson on the 6th Aug. 1901.

The two first born sons of F. M. Gibney were William Gibney and George Gibney, who were twins (William Gibney being the elder), and were born in April 1822. William Gibney and George Gibney were both living at the date of the will of Sir F. W. Dwarria, but both predeceased him without leaving issue.

The third born son of F. M. Gibney was John Wallington Bonner Gibney, who was born in the lifetime of Sir F. W. Dwarria, but after the date of the will. J. W. B. Gibney survived the testator and died on the 25th Oct. 1867, intestate, and without having had any issue. The heir-at-law of J. W. B. Gibney was his father, Dr. Gibney, who died in 1872, having by his last will disposed of his estate in such a manner that his children, the respondents, were the only persons beneficially entitled thereto.

The fourth born son of F. M. Gibney was the respondent Robert Dwaris Dwaris, formerly Robert Dwaris Gibney.

On the 14th Feb. 1902, the respondent R. D. Dwaris commenced an action by writ in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Jamaica (in Equity) against the respondents Georgiana Mary Anne Charlotte Sparkes, Frances Anne Gibney, Sylvia Caroline Owen, Harriette Brereton Gibney, and the appellant and the Rev. A. Johnson claiming to have the will of the testator in so far as the same related to Golden Grove construed and the rights and interests of the parties to the action in such estate declared.

A special case was agreed upon by the parties and filed on the 12th March 1903, for the determination by the court of the following questions, viz.: (a) Whether the testator, Sir F. W. Dwaris, died intestate as regarded the fee simple of Golden Grove expectant upon the failure or determination of the limitations above mentioned, and if so, in whom such estate was vested. (b) If the testator did not die intestate, whether J. W. B. Gibney died seized under the testator's will of a vested estate of inheritance in fee simple in remainder expectant upon the determination of the limitations referred to above, and whether upon the death and intestacy of J. W. B. Gibney, such estate vested in Dr. Gibney as the heir-at-law of J. W. B. Gibney. (c) Whether the plaintiff, R. D. Dwaris, on the failure of the limitations, became and was entitled for an estate in fee simple in possession to Golden Grove in virtue of the limitations contained in the will of the testator in favour of the eldest son of F. M. Gibney.

In pursuance of an order of the Supreme Court the special case was set down for hearing before the full court.

By a judgment of the full court (Sir F. Clarke, Chief Judge in Equity, Northcote, and Lumb, JJ.) dated the 1st May 1903, on the hearing of the special case, the questions raised therein were (in effect) answered as follows: (a) That the testator, Sir F. W. Dwaris, did not die intestate as regarded the fee simple of Golden Grove expectant upon the failure or determination of the limitations above mentioned; (b) that J. W. B. Gibney died seized under the testator's will of a vested estate in fee simple in remainder expectant upon the determination of the prior limitations and upon the death and intestacy of J. W. B. Gibney such estate vested in Dr. Gibney as the heir-at-law of J. W. B. Gibney; and question (c) was answered in the negative.

The appellant and the Rev. A. Johnson applied to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council, and such leave was duly granted.

The Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C. and J. Austen-Cartmell for the appellant, argued that the devise "to the eldest son" of Mrs. Gibney must be construed in its natural sense of "first born" son, and there being such a person in existence at the date of the will, it was a devise to a persona designata which has failed, and therefore there is an intestacy. They cited

Trafford v. Ashton, 2 Vern. 659;

Meredith v. Trefry, 12 Ch. Div. 170;

Re Harris' Trust, 2 W. R. 689;

Ogle v. Lord Sherborne, 56 L. T. Rep. 71; 34 Ch. Div. 446.

Norton, K.C. and J. F. Waggett for the respondents, contended that "the eldest son" of Mrs. Gibney meant the person who answered to that description at the time when the will took effect, and that was J. W. B. Gibney. The will should be construed so as to avoid an intestacy if possible. They cited

Coleman v. Seymour, 1 Ves. Sen. 269;

Lomax v. Holmden, 1 Ves. Sen. 290;

Thompson v. Thompson, 1 Coll. 388.

No reply was called for.

At the conclusion of the argument for the respondents their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The point raised on this appeal is a very short one, and in their Lordships' opinion free from difficulty. The question, such as it is, turns on one passage in the will of Sir Fortunatus William Dwaris. After certain limitations which have failed or determined, he disposed of a property called Golden Grove by giving it in these words: "To the eldest son of my sister, Frances McKeand Gibney, and his heirs for ever." It appears that at the time when the testator made his will Mrs. Gibney had two sons. There was, therefore, at that time in existence a person answering the description of the "eldest son" of his sister Frances. It was contended that the word "eldest" was not properly applicable to the elder of two persons, and that, if the testator had really meant Mrs. Gibney's first born son, he would have said "elder" not "eldest." In their Lordships' opinion that objection savours of hypercriticism. If a man has two sons, and only two, the ordinary way of speaking of the first born, if not designated by name, is to call him the eldest son of so-and-so. There being then a person in existence at the time answering the description in the will, their Lordships are of opinion that that person, though he died afterwards in the testator's lifetime, was the object of the testator's bounty. There is nothing in the context to warrant any departure from the proper and ordinary meaning of the words employed. All the authorities from Lomax v. Holmden (1 Ves. Sen. 290) to Meredith v. Trefry (12 Ch. Div. 170) point in the same direction. The case of Re Harris' Trust in 2 W. R. 689, on which the Appellate Court seems to place some reliance, cannot be regarded as an authority to the contrary. The learned Vice-Chancellor (Wood, V.C.) who decided that case was, at the time of the decision, under a misapprehension as to the operation of the Wills Act. He seems to have thought that with reference to the objects of testamentary bounty the Act had an effect similar to that which it has "with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it (sect. 24), an error afterwards corrected by the Court of Appeal in Bullock v. Bennett (7 D. M. & G. 283). Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise

His Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that question 1 ought to be answered by saying that the testator died intestate as regards the fee simple expectant upon the failure or determination of the limitations set out in the special case, and that upon the facts stated in the special case the estate is now vested in the appellant. As an arrangement has been made as to costs there will be no order as to costs except that the parties are to be at liberty to apply for an order to tax their costs.

MINISTER FOR PUBLIC WORKS v. HART AND ANOTHER. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Law of New South Wales—Public Works Act—Land taken for public purposes—Valuation—Costs.

By the Public Works Act of New South Wales (1900, No. 26) land for authorised works may be taken by the Government, and persons claiming compensation are to serve a notice of the particulars of their interest in the land, and of their claims for damages. The Minister for Public Works is then required to cause a valuation to be made, and to give notice to the claimant of the amount of such valuation. If the Minister and the claimant do not agree as to the valuation, the claimant may bring an action to recover the amount of compensation claimed by him. If the verdict is for a sum equal to or less than the amount of the notified valuation, the claimant is to pay the costs; but if for a greater sum, the costs are to be paid by the Minister.

In a case in which land belonging to the respondents was taken under the Act, and the Minister gave them notice of a valuation, and afterwards, at the respondents' request, reconsidered the valuation, and wrote a letter to the respondents' agent to the effect that he was prepared to pay a sum larger than the original valuation, but gave no formal notice of the increased sum under the Act, and the respondents declined the increased offer:

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the letter was a sufficient amendment of the previous formal notification, and as in the subsequent proceedings the respondents only obtained a verdict for a sum equal to the amended offer made in the letter, they were not entitled to costs.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Stephen, Acting C.J., G. B. and A. H. Simpson, JJ.). The case is reported 2 N. S. W. State Rep. 1902, 309. The facts, which were not in dispute, appear sufficiently from the headnote above, and from the judgment of their Lordships.

Asquith, K.C. and Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the appellant.

Levell, K.C. and Wood Hill for the respondents.

Vaughan Hawkins was heard in reply.

Feb. 5—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal originates in the compulsory purchase of some land in Sydney, and the question is, who is to pay the costs of an action brought to recover compensation for the land taken? This depends on the statutes of the colony of New South Wales, and on what was done. The statutes are (1) a special Act called the Darling Harbour Wharves Resumption Act (No. 10 of 1900), and (2) the Public Works Act (No. 26 of 1900). This last Act repeals and consolidates former Acts to the same effect, and, although not in force when the land in question was taken, it may for convenience be regarded as the governing Act in the case. Under these Acts, land for authorised works may be taken by notification of the Governor published in the Gazette (Public Works Act, Part 5, sects. 36 to 40). Upon such publication the land vests forthwith in the Minister who is the constructing authority; and persons claiming compensation (Part 5, sects. 94 to 99) are to serve on the Minister within ninety days, or further extended time, particulars of their estate and interest in the land resumed and of their claims for damage. The Minister (sect. 96) is then required to cause a valuation to be made of the land or of the claimant's interest, and to notify to the claimant as soon as practicable the amount of such valuation in the form scheduled to the Act, which is as follows (see sched. 6): "To A. B., claimant in respect of the land hereunder described, taken under the Public Works Act 1900. Take notice that the land hereunder described, being that in respect of the taking whereof under the authority of the aforesaid Act your claim for compensation has been lodged, has been valued at the sum of £. (Signed) A. B., constructing authority." If (sect. 97) within ninety days after service of notice of claim the Minister and claimant do not agree, the claimant may commence an action in the supreme court against the Minister to recover compensation. Under the Darling Harbour Wharves Resumption Act (sect. 6) this action is to be tried in the supreme court by a supreme court judge and two district court judges (which court is to have the powers and duties of a jury), and power is given to the supreme court to make rules as to motions for a new trial of any such action. The court is to determine the amount to be paid to the claimant. If the amount recovered by him is a sum equal to or less than the amount of the valuation notified to the claimant, he is to pay the costs of the action, but if it is a greater sum, the costs are to be paid by the Minister (see Act No. 26 of 1900, sect. 99). In the present case land was taken (by Gazette notification of the 3rd May 1900) belonging to the respondent Peter Francis Hart, who had built a street of houses thereon. The respondent Francis Faucett Moran is Hart's mortgagee. The land was valued by the Government valuers, and the Minister on the 31st

Dec. 1900 gave a notice of valuation in the scheduled form, the amount notified being 9460*l*. It appeared from the evidence at the trial that, after receiving the notice of valuation and before taking any proceedings to enforce his claim, Hart, accompanied by Mr. Ferris, a member of the Legislature, went to see Mr. Sievers, the official Government valuer, and asked that the Government valuers should reconsider their valuation. Hart urged that the cost or value of some foundations to the houses and a retaining wall had not been taken into account. The Government valuers, having considered Hart's request, increased the amount to 9900*l*. Hart requested that the result when arrived at should be notified to Ferris on his behalf. The valuers then reported to the Minister, who thereupon sent to Ferris the following letter: "Public Works Department, Sydney, 18th Feb. 1901.—Sir,—With reference to your interview with the Government land valuer respecting the claim of Peter Francis Hart, junior, requesting that the offer of compensation of 9460*l*. for property resumed at Darling Harbour be increased, I am directed by the Minister for Public Works to inform you that he has approved of the payment of 9900*l*. to the claimant in lieu of 9460*l*. previously offered.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant, ROBERT HICKSON, Under Secretary and Commissioner for Roads.—W. J. Ferris, Esq., M.P., Castlereagh-street."—This letter was received by Hart shortly after it was written, and he communicated it to his solicitors on the 5th March 1901. Mr. Hickson, who wrote the letter, referred to it in a letter to Hart's solicitors; and, on the 11th March 1901 they wrote to Mr. Hickson, saying, "Mr. Hart is not willing to accept the offer made through Mr. Ferris." No further notification of the sum offered was made, nor was the notification of the 31st Dec. 1900 formally amended by substituting the sum of 9900*l*. for 9460*l*. Moreover, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Sievers, the principal Government valuer, that although Mr. Hart's request for an increased sum was considered by Mr. Sievers and his colleagues, they did not make any fresh valuation. His words were "in making the amended offer we gave way generally to what Mr. Hart stated, but did not increase our valuation." The whole question before their Lordships turns upon the effect of the foregoing letter of the 18th Feb. 1901; but before considering this point it will be convenient to state shortly what afterwards took place. Hart refused the offer of 9900*l*. and he and his mortgagees brought an action against the Minister and claimed 16,500*l*. In his declaration he stated that his claim for compensation had been valued at 9460*l*., and no mention was made of the increased offer of 9900*l*. The Minister put in a plea stating that the amount of the valuation which he caused to be made and notified to the plaintiffs was 9900*l*., and that this sum exceeded the compensation to which the plaintiffs were entitled. The plaintiffs in their reply denied both statements in the plea. The action was tried before a judge of the Supreme Court and two District Court judges. Evidence was gone into on both sides, and the court fixed the compensation to be paid at 9900*l*., the amount offered by the letter of the 18th Feb. 1901. The defendant then signed judgment for the costs of the action. The court considered that any irregularity in the notification of the 9900*l*. had been waived by the plaintiffs. The judgment was signed on the 21st April 1902. On the 22nd May 1902 the plaintiffs obtained from the full court (Stephen, Acting C.J. and G. B. and A. H. Simpson, JJ.) a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs on the issue as to the notified valuation on the grounds (1) that the verdict on the said issue was against evidence, (2) that the only valuation made and notified to the plaintiffs in accordance with the Act was for 9460*l*., (3) that the court was wrong in holding that the plaintiffs had waived the requirements of the Act as to making and notifying the valuation, and (4) that the waiver had not been pleaded. The application to make the rule absolute was heard on the 5th and 6th Aug. 1902. The court held that the Darling Harbour Resumption Court had no jurisdiction to determine the question on which the right to the costs of the action depended, viz., what was the amount of the notified valuation, and that the findings of the amended postea on that question were a nullity. They did not hold as a matter of law that the valuation notified on the 31st Dec. 1900 could not be informally amended, but held that there had not been in fact any new valuation, and that the letter of the 18th Feb. 1901, was not a notice of any valuation. They made an order, dated the 6th Aug. 1902, that the judgment signed on the 21st April 1902, be amended by striking out all the findings as to notification of value, and by converting it into a judgment simply in favour of the plaintiffs for 9900*l*., interest and taxed costs, thus deciding, in effect, that the only notified valuation was for 9460*l*., and that the Minister should pay the costs of the action. From this decision the Minister appeals to His Majesty in Council. Their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. The requirements of the statute were all properly complied with in every matter of substance. There was a proper valuation of the property, and a sufficient notification of the result of such valuation. No further valuation was necessary. The valuers had all the materials for reconsidering the amount of compensation which should be offered, and neither as a matter of business nor as a matter of statutory obligation was any second valuation required. If without any further valuation a fresh notification in the form of the schedule to the statute had been sent in with the sum of 9900*l*. substituted for 9460*l*., their lordships can hardly conceive that any objection could have been taken to it. Certainly none could have been legally sustained. The objection to the proceedings is thus reduced to a question of form, and form only. No doubt it would have been more regular if the letter of the 18th Feb. 1901, had been in the form of the schedule; but it emanated from the proper authority after a sufficient valuation by a properly constituted board of valuers and on their advice. The letter is open to no ambiguity; it refers to the previous offer, and in their Lordships' opinion the Government could not legally have repudiated that letter even before they formally bound themselves to it by their plea in the action. In their Lordships' opinion the letter of the 18th Feb. 1901 was an amendment of the previous formal notification, and was sufficient.

CT. OF APP.] BRANDTS, SONS, AND CO. v. DUNLOP RUBBER COMPANY LIM. [CT. OF APP.]

The statutory enactment, which refers to the form of the notice to be given of the amount of valuation, is sect. 96 of the General Act, No. 26, of 1900. That section, no doubt, requires the Minister to inform the claimant "of the amount of such valuation by notice in the form of the 6th schedule hereto"; and the schedule states that the claim for compensation has been valued at £1. There was, no doubt, a non-observance of this form, and an irregularity. But it was attributable to the unusual manner in which the Minister was approached by the claimant, who threw the Minister off his guard; and it would be most unjust to allow the claimant to take advantage of this irregularity. But without it he has no case whatever. Under these circumstances their Lordships do not feel compelled by the language of sect. 96 to hold that the mere irregularity in form vitiates all that has been done and defeats the evident object of the Statute. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to reverse the judgment or order appealed from with costs, and to restore the judgment or order of the Darling Harbour Resumption Court signed on the 21st April 1902. The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, Jan. 29.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.)

BRANDTS, SONS, AND CO. v. DUNLOP RUBBER COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Assignment of debt—"Absolute assignment by writing"—Request to debtor to pay third person—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25 (6).

The defendants being indebted to K. for the price of goods sold, K. sent to the plaintiffs, for them to forward to the defendants, a letter, signed by him and addressed to the defendants, as follows: "Kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to" the plaintiffs. The attached letter, addressed to the plaintiffs, was as follows: "Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to the approval of the goods, the amount of invoices—viz., 369l. and 3263l.—for seventy-five packages . . . received from K. and Co., when due, direct to your good selves, for account of K. and Co."

The plaintiffs sent these two documents to the defendants with a request to sign and return the counterpart. The counterpart was returned to the plaintiffs, but was signed by a person who had no authority to sign on behalf of the defendants.

Held (reversing the judgment of Walton, J.) that the two documents did not constitute "an absolute assignment" of the debt, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873.

lute assignment" of the debt, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873.

APPEAL of the defendants from the judgment of Walton, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum of 3263l., either under an assignment from Kramrisch and Co., or, alternatively, under an agreement by the defendants to pay that sum to the plaintiffs.

In Nov. 1902 the plaintiffs, who were bankers, made arrangements with Kramrisch and Co. for the purpose of financing the latter's commercial transactions. Kramrisch and Co., who carried on business at Liverpool, bought goods for shipment from abroad and sold them to customers in England.

The plaintiffs accepted bills drawn by the foreign sellers for the price of the goods sold to Kramrisch and Co.; and Kramrisch and Co. directed their customers in England to pay the invoice price to the plaintiffs. Many transactions of this kind took place.

In Jan. 1903 Kramrisch and Co. had bought two parcels of rubber, and the plaintiffs had accepted bills drawn by the sellers for the price, amounting to 3430l.

Kramrisch and Co. resold these two parcels of rubber to the defendants for 369l. and 3263l. respectively.

On the 3rd Jan. Kramrisch and Co. wrote to the plaintiffs a letter saying, with respect to these goods, "We engage to grant you the sole and absolute lien on said goods and their proceeds until you have received full payment, plus charges, of the advance granted to us on said goods for 3430l., and we further engage to hold this transaction separate from any other."

On the 6th Jan. 1903 Kramrisch and Co. wrote to the plaintiffs inclosing a document, which by the covering letter they asked the plaintiffs to forward to the defendants.

The document was in the following form, the two parts being detachable the one from the other:

To the Dunlop Rubber Company Limited. To Messrs. Brandts, Sons, and Co.

Dear Sirs,

Kindly sign the attached letter, and forward the same to Messrs. Brandts, Sons, and Co.

Yours truly,

KRAMRISCH AND CO.

Dear Sirs,

Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to the approval of the goods, the amount of invoices—viz., 369l. and 3263l.—for seventy-five packages of raw rubber received to-day from Messrs. Kramrisch and Co., when due, direct to your good selves, for account of Messrs. Kramrisch and Co.

Yours truly,

On the 7th Jan. the plaintiffs forwarded this document entire to the defendants at their works at Birmingham, where the rubber had been delivered, with a letter requesting them to sign and return the counterpart.

On the 8th Jan. the second part of the document was returned to the plaintiffs signed "(sgd.) For the Dunlop Rubber Company Limited (Para Mills). John Gooding, A. G. P.," this being impressed by a rubber stamp. Gooding was the manager of the defendants' works.

The head office and registered office of the defendants was in London, and Gooding omitted to inform the head office of the above document.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kramrisch and Co. sent to the defendants' works at Birmingham two invoices for the two sums of 369*l.* and 3263*l.*, stamped with a direction to pay the amount to the plaintiffs. The invoice for 369*l.* was forwarded to the head office, and the amount was paid to the plaintiffs. The invoice for 3263*l.* was returned to Kramrisch and Co. for correction, and the corrected invoice which they sent did not bear any direction to pay the amount to the plaintiffs. This corrected invoice was forwarded to the defendants' head office in London, and they paid the amount to Kramrisch and Co.'s general bankers instead of to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to recover the sum of 3263*l.*, either upon the undertaking signed by the defendants, or under the assignment from Kramrisch and Co. to them contained in the document sent to them by Kramrisch and Co. and forwarded by them to the defendants.

The defendants contended that Gooding had no authority to sign the undertaking, and that they were not bound by it; and that the document in question was not an absolute assignment, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873.

The Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66) provides:

Sect. 25 (6). Any absolute assignment, by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only), of any debt or other legal choses in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, trustee, or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to receive or claim such debt or choses in action, shall be and be deemed to have been effectual in law (subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this Act had not passed), to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or choses in action from the date of such notice, and all legal or other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same, without the concurrence of the assignor.

The action was tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiffs.

R. M. Bray, K.C. and Schiller for the defendants.

April 2, 1903.—WALTON, J.—[The learned judge stated the facts, and then proceeded:] Now, in the first place, it is necessary to decide whether the undertaking given by Gooding for the Dunlop Rubber Company is binding upon the company. The defendants say that Gooding had no authority in fact to give any such undertaking. The plaintiffs say that he had, and that, if he had not, at any rate he was held out as a person having such authority, and the defendants are bound as if he had authority. I have come to the conclusion that in fact Gooding had no authority to act in this matter. His duty was to send a document of this kind to London, or to get authority from London before signing it. Therefore I find that in fact he had not any authority to sign the document. The next question is whether he was held out as having authority to sign. It seems to me that it would be carrying the doctrine of holding out very far to say that there was sufficient evidence here of holding out. I do not, however, think that it is necessary for the purposes of my judgment to say more than that I feel a very great difficulty in accepting the argument that there was such a holding out here as would be binding upon the defendants. Then the case is put in another way. It is said that this double document of the 6th Jan., together with the letter of the 7th Jan., with which they were sent to the defendants by the plaintiffs, amount to an assignment to the plaintiffs of the debt of 3263*l.* Kramrisch and Co. sent these two documents on the 6th Jan. to the plaintiffs, in order that the plaintiffs might send them on to the defendants, undoubtedly in order that the plaintiffs might obtain payment direct to themselves of this sum of 3263*l.* I think that there can be no doubt at all about that. The plaintiffs forwarded them to the defendants with a letter saying that they had received them from Kramrisch and Co., and requesting the defendants to sign. Now, does that amount to an assignment of the debt by Kramrisch and Co. to the plaintiffs? I think that the debt was assigned by Kramrisch and Co. to the plaintiffs, and that that is the effect of these documents. I have no doubt that the intention of Kramrisch and Co. was to make over to the plaintiffs the right to receive this money for themselves and to give a good discharge for it. Was there notice of that to the defendants? It seems to me that the whole transaction was submitted to the defendants, and I think that Gooding had authority to receive notice of such an assignment. I think that notice was given to the defendants that Kramrisch and Co. had made over to the plaintiffs the right to receive this sum of money, and had given them power to give a good discharge for it. Now, is that an absolute assignment within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873? A number of cases have been cited, but I do not know whether they assist us very much, because the general principles applicable to a question of this kind are now, I think, fairly clearly ascertained. Perhaps the most important case upon the general principles which has been cited is the case of Durham v. Robertson (78 L. T. Rep. 438; (1898) 1 Q. B. 765). In that case Chitty, L.J. laid down very clearly the law and the doctrines of equity with regard to documents of assignment of choses in action. He said: "Dealing with the case apart from the Judicature Act, there is here unquestionably a valid equitable assignment. To operate as a valid equitable assignment no particular form of words is required in the document; an engagement or direction to pay, out of a debt or fund, a sum of money constitutes an equitable assignment, though it does not operate as an assignment of the whole fund or debt. A mere charge on a fund or debt operates as a partial equitable assignment. As is well known, an ordinary debt or choses in action before the Judicature Act was not assignable so as to pass the right of action at law, but it was assignable so as to pass the right to sue in equity. . . . Now, in order to afford some remedy for this state of the law that sub-sect. 6 was passed. It is plain on reading it that it does not apply to every case of equitable assignment of a debt or choses in action. . . . To bring a case within the sub-section transferring the legal right to sue for the debt and empowering the assignee to give a good discharge for the debt, there must be (in the language of the sub-section) an absolute assignment not purporting to be by way of charge only. It is requisite that the assignment should be, or at all events purport to be, absolute, but it will not suffice if the assignment purport to be by way of charge only. It is plain that every equitable assignment in the wide sense of the term as used in equity is not within the enactment." Was this an absolute assignment? In support of the view which I take that it was an absolute assignment, the case of Harding v. Harding (17 Q. B. Div. 442) was cited, and I refer to that case because the document in that case is not dissimilar from the document relied on in the present case. The headnote of that case is this: "The defendants, who were executors and trustees under a will, sent to G., one of the residuary legatees, a statement of account showing a balance to be due to him on account of his share of the residuary estate. G., who lived in Australia, sent this account to his daughter, the plaintiff, with the following direction on it in his handwriting: 'I hereby instruct the trustees in power to pay to my daughter L. H. the balance shown in the above statement. . . . ' Notice in writing of this document was given by the plaintiff to the defendants, but they refused to be bound by it. Held, that the document was a valid assignment of the balance in the hands of the defendants, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount." Wills, J. in his judgment said: "In the present case it was proposed to assign a sum of money due from the trustees, the defendants; and probably before the Judicature Act it would have been impossible to give a legal title to Laura Harding so as to enable her to sue in her own name in respect of this right of action; she could have maintained a suit in equity, but the legal title could not have been completed in her. Now it can be done; and it seems to me that the legal title has been so completed by the notice signed by George Harding and sent by him to the plaintiff. If it is to be regarded as an equitable assignment, he has done all that he could to make it complete; if as a legal assignment, he has completed it; and under sect. 25, sub-sect. 6, of the Judicature Act 1873, the assignee of a chose in action may sue in his own name, the law as to the necessity for a consideration not applying, as it seems to me, if the assignment is completely made." The direction given in that case cannot, to my mind, be distinguished from the direction given in the present case. It makes no difference if this was given by way of security, if it was an absolute assignment, as I think it was. Mr. Bray contended that this was not an absolute assignment because it must be read by the light of the letter of lien which was not an absolute assignment. I agree that the letter of lien was not an absolute assignment, but that is not the assignment relied on. This document of the 6th Jan. was sent to the plaintiffs in order that they might be assured that they would be the proper persons to receive the money and to give the receipt for it, and if it had been paid to them they would clearly have been the proper persons to give the receipt. That being so, I think this was an absolute assignment of which notice was given, and that on this ground the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. With regard to the other cases which were cited, the document in Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans (79 L. T. Rep. 496; 81 L. T. Rep. 376; (1899) 2 Q. B. 613) was different from the document in this case, and the same considerations do not apply. As to Ex parte Hall; Re Whitting (40 L. T. Rep. 179; 10 Ch. Div. 615), there, again, the document was very different from this document. In the present case I attach great importance to the fact that the document is not merely an authority or direction to pay, but is a document asking in terms for an undertaking that payment will be made; whether that undertaking is given or not does not affect the meaning of the document sent. It differs in that respect from Ex parte Hall (ubi sup.). There is also another difference which I think underlies the decision in that case. It was there contended that the document was an assignment of the rent, and it was held that, if it was given in pursuance of an agreement to assign the rent, that agreement would be within the Statute of Frauds, and that the court therefore could not take notice of the existence of any such agreement. For that reason also I think that case is distinguishable from the present case. For the reasons which I have stated I think that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

B. M. Bray, K.C. and Schiller for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that there was an "absolute assignment by writing," of which express notice in writing was given to the defendants, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873. The real questions on this appeal are whether the two attached documents were an absolute assignment, and whether express notice in writing was given to the defendants of that assignment. These documents cannot be said to be an assignment at all. There is, on their face, merely a request to the debtors to assent to a new contract, in the form attached, to pay their debt to the plaintiffs. There is nothing said about an assignment in these documents. They might refer to any other kind of arrangement besides an assignment between Kramrisch and the plaintiffs. The intention and meaning of the words in sect. 25 (6), "absolute assignment by writing of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor," is that the debtor may not be left in any doubt as to what his position is with regard to his creditor, and what he may safely do to discharge his debt. Now, these documents do not on their face purport in terms to assign anything or in any way to transfer the property in the debt. The document to be signed by the defendants purports to be, and was intended to be, only a document by which the defendants might consent to a new contract with the plaintiffs. There was a request to sign that document, but the defendants were not bound to sign it. If there was an absolute assignment, that request would have been unnecessary, for the defendants would have been bound to pay the plaintiffs whether they signed or not. There are authorities which show that this cannot be construed as an absolute assignment. In Ex parte Hall; Re Whitting (40 L. T. Rep. 179; 10 Ch. Div. 615) the creditor gave to his bankers a letter addressed to his debtor, in which he said: "I hereby authorise and request you to pay to . . . 200l. to my credit for which I will accept their receipt as so much of your rent discharged"; and it was held by the Court of Appeal that this was only a revocable authority to pay and not an assignment. The words in the present case are not so strong as they were in that case. That case shows that a mere request or authority by the creditor to the debtor to pay a third person is not an absolute assignment, but is only a revocable authority to pay. The case of Harding v. Harding (17 Q. B. Div. 442), upon which the plaintiffs rely, is clearly distinguishable, because there was in that case an irrevocable authority to pay. The case of Durham v. Robertson (78 L. T. Rep. 438; (1898) 1 Q. B. 765) does not really affect the question in the present case, the decision there being on the question whether the assignment was by way of charge only. In Fisher v. Calvert (27 W. R. 301) the only question was whether there was a sufficient equitable assignment in a case where the assignor was made a party. Even if this was an absolute assignment, there was not a sufficient notice to the defendants. The head office and registered office of the defendants is in London, and these documents were sent to their works at Birmingham. Sect. 62 of the Companies Act 1862 provides that "any summons, notice, . . . required to be served upon the company may be served by leaving the same, or sending it through the post in a prepaid letter addressed to the company, at their registered office." The notice must reach the company at some place where there is an official whose duty it is to receive and act upon it, and in this case that would be at the London office of the defendants from which all payments were made. If the procedure given by sect. 62 is not followed, the person giving notice in some other way takes the risk of the notice not coming to the hands of the proper official.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the respondents.—The learned judge rightly decided that there was an absolute assignment within sect. 25 (6). This document as a whole cannot fairly be read as being a mere request by Kramrisch to the defendants to pay the money to the plaintiffs. Its real effect is that it is an instruction to the defendants to pay the plaintiffs, as was the case in Harding v. Harding (17 Q. B. Div. 442). This document is unconditional in its terms, and it intimates to the debtors that Brandt Sons, and Co. are the persons who are entitled to receive this money. When this document was sent by Kramrisch to the plaintiffs it was an absolute assignment by him to them as soon as it came to their hands; and, when it was sent on to the defendants, the assignment was completed by notice to them. The ordinary simple construction of this document is that it is an absolute assignment by Kramrisch to the plaintiffs; and the defendants could not reasonably think that it was anything else. Though the defendants may not be bound to sign the undertaking and may refuse to sign, yet the document is still an assignment, and they are bound to pay the plaintiffs as assignees. If the defendants did sign, they would be liable upon a different basis and would have undertaken a different personal liability to the plaintiffs from that under which they were before by reason of the assignment. The words "for account of Kramrisch" only show that the plaintiffs could discharge the defendants from all claims by Kramrisch, and they support the view that this was an assignment. The case of Harding v. Harding (ubi sup.) is a clear authority in favour of the plaintiffs that a document in this form is an assignment within sect. 25 (6). In Ex parte Hall; Re Whitting (40 L. T. Rep. 179; 10 Ch. Div. 615) there was in fact a verbal assignment which was invalid by reason of sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds; and it was not decided that words of request or authority could not be an absolute assignment. The decision in Brice v. Bannister (33 L. T. Rep. 739; 3 Q. B. Div. 569) is also a clear authority that this document is an absolute assignment within sect. 25 (6). In Percival v. Dunn (32 L. T. Rep. 520; 29 Ch. Div. 128) the distinction was pointed out between a request to a debtor to pay a specific debt to a third person, and a mere general request to pay money to a third person. There was good notice of this assignment given to the defendants. Sect. 62 of the Companies Act 1862 does not affect the question; it merely gives an optional mode of service. The learned judge has found as a fact that Gooding had authority to receive notice, and there was ample evidence upon which he could properly so find. If the defendants did sign the undertaking, they were trustees of the money for the plaintiffs and are liable. The facts show that Gooding had authority to sign on their behalf, or, at any rate, that he was held out as having authority. Even if there was no assignment within sect. 25 (6), yet the plaintiffs are equitable assignees and can, in the circumstances, sue without making Kramrisch a party, inasmuch as he had fully discharged the defendants before this action was commenced.

Bray, K.C. in reply.—The learned judge has found as a fact that Gooding had no authority to sign the undertaking, and that finding cannot be impugned. There was no evidence that he was held out as having authority, or that the position of the plaintiffs had been made any worse thereby.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This is, I think, a case of considerable difficulty, and the main point raised is one of great importance. I have little doubt that such documents as these are used to a considerable extent in commercial transactions. The respondents ask us to say that the documents here in question are so clearly only consistent with there having been an assignment of the debt that they can only be construed as an absolute assignment either legal or equitable. After full and careful consideration, and after hearing the very able arguments on both sides, I cannot come to that conclusion. To establish their case it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show, within the terms of sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873, that there is an "absolute assignment by writing (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of the debt . . . of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor." The document, therefore, must be an absolute assignment in writing under the hand of the assignor. The respondents endeavoured to make that out by reading together the two documents of the 6th Jan. which were sent on by the plaintiffs to the defendants. Those two documents were attached to each other; the one addressed by Kramrisch to the defendants being, "Kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to" the plaintiffs; the other, addressed by the defendants to the plaintiffs, being. "Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit . . . the amount of invoices—viz., 389l. and 3263l. . . . when due, direct to your good selves, for account of Messrs. Kramrisch and Co." Now, if that reasonably indicates an assignment, it is signed by the assignor. It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the words "for account of Messrs. Kramrisch and Co.," really mean that the plaintiffs might give a receipt for the money, and that that is the proper construction of the document and one which removes all difficulties. But, looking at the earlier part of the document, I do not think that that is its true business meaning. The document does not in terms purport to be an assignment; it only purports to be a request to the defendants to pay the amount to the plaintiffs. If it had really been signed by the defendants, they would have been liable to pay the amount to the plaintiffs, for the same reasons as the defendants were liable in Harding v. Harding (17 Q. B. Div. 442). I cannot, however, see any valid answer to the contention of the defendants that it cannot be assumed as the foundation of this document that there was any assignment at all of the debt, and there is nothing whatever to show that this document must be treated as an assignment, because Kramrisch only requests the defendants to sign it and give it to the plaintiffs. The document seems to be quite consistent with there having been a verbal bargain that the money should be received by the plaintiffs on Kramrisch's account, or that there should be a lien on the money in favour of the plaintiffs. I think that business men of experience in these matters would have no difficulty in suggesting various different ways in which the plaintiffs might claim that the proceeds of these goods should come to their hands without there being an assignment of the debt. Therefore this document is consistent with there being something other than an assignment of the debt, and it is for that reason impossible to take the document itself as being a document of assignment. I do not base my judgment upon the fact that there had been a document of lien given by Kramrisch to the plaintiffs a few days before. If, however, we cannot see that this document is an absolute assignment upon its face, and if we can look at other matters outside of the document itself, we must see at once that there was no assignment of the debt unless this particular document was an assignment. I have come to the conclusion that this document is not upon the face of it an assignment of the debt; there is merely a request to the defendants to sign the undertaking to pay the plaintiffs. It is nothing more than an authority to the defendants to pay the debt to the plaintiffs, and it is not an assignment of the debt. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that this document does not fulfil the conditions which are necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to sue in their own names as assignees of the debt, because it is not an absolute assignment, or an assignment at all, within sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act 1873. I do not think that any of the cases which have been cited do more than illustrate how the principles governing this question are to be applied. In Harding v. Harding (ubi sup.) it is true that Wills, J. did express an opinion that the document there in question might be an assignment within sect. 25 (6); but I think that the real ground of the decision in that case was the fact that the debtors had assented to the arrangement that they should pay the money to the plaintiff, and were therefore bound upon equitable principles to do so. With regard to the case of Ex parte Hall; Re Whitting (40 L. T. Rep. 179; 10 Ch. Div. 615), I doubt whether it can be treated as doing more than illustrating the general principles applicable to cases of this kind, because the decision of that case was complicated by the fact that sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds was applicable to the agreement which was there relied upon. I do not think that that case should be treated as an authority showing that the words, "I hereby authorise and request you to pay," are to be decided, one way or the other, as being or not being an assignment. I am now satisfied, with regard to the case of Brice v. Bannister (38 L. T. Rep. 739; 3 Q. B. Div. 569), that the difficulty which has been felt as to the main ground of the judgment is because there was not an assignment of the whole of the debt, but of a part only, and therefore only a charge. The language of the document in Brice v. Bannister (ubi sup.) was different from that in the present case; the words in that case were: "I do hereby order, authorise, and request you to pay to . . . the sum of . . . and his receipt for same shall be a good discharge." That was quite a different kind of transaction and a different kind of document from that in this case, which, as I have already pointed out, might indicate many things besides an assignment. Therefore I feel no doubt that this document was not an assignment within sect. 25 (6). Upon the question whether a good notice was given, if this had been an assignment, I am not prepared to differ from the decision of the learned judge, but it is not necessary for us to decide that question. As to whether Gooding had authority to sign this document on behalf of the defendants, I entirely agree with the judgment of the learned judge, and I can see nothing to justify the suggestion that there was a holding out of Gooding as having authority to sign. This appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and judgment be entered for the defendants.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, though I have felt some hesitation in differing from the judgment of the learned judge. I have, however, come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed, and I will add but a few words upon the main question in the case. It seems to me that, upon a critical examination of these two documents, they do not fulfil the description in sect. 25 (6) of "any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor." Upon the face of these documents there is no absolute assignment at all. There is upon the face of the document a request from Kramrisch, addressed to the defendants, to make an agreement with the plaintiffs to pay to the plaintiffs the sum which would be payable by the defendants to Kramrisch. Kramrisch suggests to the defendants that they shall make a fresh contract to pay the plaintiffs instead of him. It may be that the letter rather assumes that some arrangement has been made before the letter was written, but the letter itself suggests an agreement to be made, and makes no reference to an absolute assignment. It presupposes some arrangement between Kramrisch and the plaintiffs, but that is not enough to make it an absolute assignment. The document itself must be an absolute assignment. Here we have a letter addressed by Kramrisch to the defendants and sent by him to the plaintiffs to forward to the defendants. It runs thus: "To the Dunlop Rubber Company.—Dear Sirs,—Kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to Messrs. Brandts, Sons, and Co."; and then the attached letter is as follows: "To Messrs. Brandts, Sons, and Co.—Dear Sirs,—Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to the approval of the goods, the amount of invoices—viz., 369*l.* and 3263*l.*—for . . . received from Kramrisch and Co., when due, direct to your good selves, for account of Messrs. Kramrisch and Co.—Yours truly, —" Now, that appears to me to express just what it says—that is, the confirmation by the defendants of some existing arrangement between Kramrisch and the plaintiffs. The one document is an undertaking by the defendants to pay direct to the plaintiffs the money which would become due from the defendants to Kramrisch; and the other is a request by Kramrisch to the defendants to become liable by contract to pay the money to the plaintiffs; there is no absolute assignment to be found in those documents. Therefore, as we do not find an assignment on the face of the documents, we are really asked to collect one from the surrounding circumstances. If we do look at the surrounding circumstances, the inference seems to be that the arrangement, by which a lien was given by Kramrisch to the plaintiffs, was referred to in the documents. It is, however, enough for us to say that we cannot here find upon these documents an absolute assignment, and that the case is therefore not within sect. 25 (6). Farther, we find in the document the words, "for account of Messrs. Kramrisch and Co.," which suggests that some interest in the money was retained by Kramrisch, and therefore there was not an absolute assignment. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and desire to add only a few words upon the main point. I ask myself the broad question whether these documents constituted in themselves an assignment of the debt or notice of an assignment. When I say an "assignment," I include an equitable assignment even if not an "absolute assignment" within sect. 25 (6). There is difficulty in dealing with the documents by themselves without bringing in the other relations between Kramrisch and the plaintiffs. Now, on the face of the documents themselves, they amount only in terms to a request by Kramrisch to the defendants to bind themselves to pay the money to the plaintiffs. Why Kramrisch did this does not appear upon the documents, nor the relations between Kramrisch and the plaintiffs, except that the plaintiffs were to receive the money "for account of" Kramrisch. There is no suggestion on the documents of any previous assignment by Kramrisch to the plaintiffs. The defendants were not bound to speculate why these documents were being given by Kramrisch. The defendants were not bound to sign the document. Were the defendants bound to assume that, if they did not sign this document, Kramrisch had by these documents alone given an irrevocable mandate to them to pay the money to the plaintiffs? Although the question is not free from difficulty, I am of opinion that they were not so bound. I do not think that the defendants were bound to regard these documents themselves as being an assignment in the broad sense which I have indicated. These documents give no notice of any kind of any previous assignment. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

STOCKDALE v. ASCHERBERG. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Lease for three years—Covenant by tenant to pay "outgoings"—Reconstruction of drainage by order of local authority—Liability of tenant.

*By an agreement in writing the plaintiff let a house to the defendant for a term of three years, and then from year to year until either party should give three months' notice, at a yearly rent of 55*l.; and the defendant agreed to pay "all outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises."

*During the term of three years the plaintiff expended 83*l.* in reconstructing the drainage of the house in compliance with a notice from the local authority.*

Held (affirming the judgment of Wright, J.), that the tenant was liable to pay the expense of doing this work as an "outgoing" within the meaning of the agreement, although the term was short and the rent small.

APPEAL of the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of 83*l.*, being the amount of the expense incurred by the plaintiff in reconstructing the drainage of premises of which the defendant was tenant to the plaintiff.

By an agreement in writing, dated the 25th March 1902, the plaintiff let to the defendant a house, No. 68, Brondesbury-villas, Kilburn, for a term of three years, and then from year to year until one of the parties should give to the other three calendar months' notice in writing, at the clear net yearly rent of 55*l.*, to be paid on the usual quarter days free from deductions except landlord's property tax.

By this agreement the defendant agreed to pay "all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises as they become due, landlord's property tax only excepted."

The defendant also agreed to keep and leave the premises, including the fixtures, in as good condition as they were at the date of the agreement, reasonable wear and tear excepted, and to keep the gutters, stack-pipes, water-closets, and cisterns clean, and to keep in repair all sash-lines and internal pipes and taps.

STOCKDALE v. ASCHERBERG.

[CT. OF APP.]

On the 4th Sept. 1902 a notice was served upon the plaintiff by the Willesden Urban District Council, under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, stating that a nuisance existed on the premises and requiring him to abate it, and for that purpose to take up and relay throughout the premises the existing drains, which were defective.

In compliance with that notice the plaintiff carried out the required work, and thereby incurred expense to the amount of 83*l*.

This action was brought to recover that sum of 83*l*. from the defendant under the terms of the agreement of tenancy.

The action was tried before Wright, J. without a jury, and the learned judge held that the defendant was liable to pay the amount claimed, as an "outgoing," under the terms of the agreement: (88 L. T. Rep. 767).

The defendant appealed.

E. Foa for the appellant.—The judgment of the learned judge was wrong. It is true that, since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Foulger v. Arding (86 L. T. Rep. 488; (1902) 1 K. B. 700), it cannot be contended that in some cases a covenant by a tenant to pay "outgoings" will not cover an expense of this kind. But that rule is not applicable to every lease or agreement of tenancy. In Foulger v. Arding (ubi sup.) Collins, M.R. said: "Underlying the whole matter is the consideration that we are dealing with a contract of demise between landlord and tenant, and the covenant must be assumed to relate only to matters which may reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties as being within the purview of such a contract." A covenant of this kind must, therefore, be construed by having regard to that which the parties might reasonably be supposed to have contemplated. For that purpose the length of the term, the character of the premises, and the amount of the rent ought to be taken into consideration. The rule laid down in Foulger v. Arding (ubi sup.) has been considered in several subsequent cases. In Valpy v. St. Leonards Wharf Company (1 L. G. R. 305), where there was a lease of a cottage upon a yearly tenancy at a rent of 20*l*., Farwell, J. held that a covenant by the tenant to pay "outgoings" would not include the expense of paving a yard, in compliance with a notice from the local authority, at a cost of 58*l*.. Then the present case was decided by Wright, J., and the learned judge held that it was materially different from the case decided by Farwell, J. The question next arose in Re Wariner; Brayshaw v. Ninnis (88 L. T. Rep. 766; (1903) 2 Ch. 367), and there Eady, J. followed the present case, the lease being for a term of three years at a rent of 54*l*.. The last case upon the question was again decided by Wright, J., and in Harris v. Hickman (89 L. T. Rep. 722; (1904) 1 K. B. 13) that learned judge followed Valpy v. St. Leonards Wharf Company (ubi sup.) and held that a covenant to pay "outgoings" of this description was not applicable to a yearly tenancy which arose through the tenant holding over after the expiration of a term of three years. Before Foulger v. Arding (ubi sup.) there were eight cases decided in which the word "outgoings" was used, but in all but one of those cases the term was a long term. The exception was Batchelor v. Bigger (60 L. T. Rep. 416), but in that case the expenses in question were for paving a street, and the fact that the street had not been paved must have been apparent to the tenant when he took the premises, whereas the defective condition of drains is not apparent. In the case of a short tenancy of small premises it ought to be held that it could not have been in the contemplation of the parties that the tenant, by a covenant to pay "outgoings," should be liable to heavy expenses of this kind incurred for improvements of a permanent character. In this case the covenant to repair on the part of the tenant is very material, for it shows that it was intended that he should be liable only to a very slight extent for anything in the nature of repair. The words of this covenant are "outgoings for the time being payable . . . as they become due," and those words show that in this agreement the word "outgoings" ought to receive a more limited meaning as intended to include only temporary and recurring expenses. The Public Health Act 1875 clearly and expressly imposes the liability to pay these expenses upon the landlord, and that liability ought not to be transferred to the tenant unless it is perfectly clear that the parties intended that it should be so transferred.

G. F. Hohler, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—Whatever sympathy we may feel for a tenant under an agreement like this, who is called upon to pay a sum which in fact he never anticipated that he would be liable to pay, yet the question is whether he is bound by the terms of his contract to accept that liability. It seems to me to be too clear for argument that it is now settled by the authorities that a covenant such as this does cover such a class of expense as this, which is rendered necessary by reason of the order of the local authority to do sanitary works. The order of the local authority in this case was that the owner should take up and relay the drainage throughout the premises. No doubt that was a very drastic order. But the defendant took premises the drainage of which was in point of fact defective, and it is, it seems to me, impossible at the present day to say that it cannot be in the contemplation of the parties to a contract of tenancy that the local authority may at some time during the term insist upon the execution of sanitary works upon the demised premises. We cannot say that this kind of expense was so clearly outside of the contemplation of the parties at the time of the agreement that it would be unreasonable to suppose that it was the intention of the parties that the terms of the agreement should cover such an expense. If a landlord and tenant come to an agreement in clear and express terms whereby the tenant accepts the obligation to pay "outgoings," the tenant will be liable to pay such expenses as this. It seems to me that to hold otherwise would be straining the language of the agreement, and introducing into the consideration an element, which it would be impossible to limit or analyse, as controlling the clear words used by the parties. In my opinion the judgment of the learned judge was correct, and this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the judgment of Wright, J. was per-

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

Monday, Jan. 11.

Re KECK'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a)

Settled land—Settled Land Acts—Scheme for improvement—Capital money in hands of trustees—Approval of scheme by court—Evidence—Jurisdiction—Settled Land Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 22, 25, 26, 44, 53—Settled Land Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 15.

In a case in which the tenant for life submitted a scheme to the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts for the expenditure of capital moneys in their hands on the improvement of the estate and the trustees sanctioned the scheme, but the next remainderman objected to the same on the ground that it was improvident, while not alleging either that it was ultra vires of the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts or conceived in bad faith, and the tenant for life applied for the sanction of the court under the Settled Land Act 1882, s. 26, sub-s. 2 (iii.):

Held, that before making an order the court had a duty cast upon it under the Settled Land Act 1882 to satisfy itself that the scheme was such as could in the interest of the remainderman be reasonably sanctioned.

SUMMONS.

Certain real estate in the county of Leicester together with certain moneys and investments liable to be laid out in the purchase of land were settled under the will of George Anthony Keck, deceased. Under the settlement so created Harry Leicester Powys Keck, of Kingston Hill, Surrey, was tenant for life in possession, and Thomas Charles Leicester Keck was tenant for life in remainder, and Charles Marriott and Thomas Palmer were trustees of this settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. In July 1901 H. L. P. Keck presented to the trustees a scheme for the improvement of the settled estate; the scheme comprised (inter alia) the making of a road, and its general object was the improvement of the estate for building purposes. In August of the same year both trustees sanctioned the scheme, and certain moneys were expended on it by H. L. P. Keck, who subsequently applied to the court by summons under the Settled Land Acts 1882 to 1890 in which he asked (inter alia) that the trustees (who, with the remainderman T. C. L. Keck, were respondents to the summons) might be authorised or directed to pay to him out of capital moneys in their hands certain sums in respect of his expenditure upon these improvements. T. C. L. Keck, as remainderman, opposed the application on the ground that the proposed scheme was improvident and not calculated to benefit the estate. A number of affidavits was filed on both sides by surveyors and land agents.

Upjohn, K.C. and E. P. Hewitt for the applicant.—In this case the trustees have accepted the scheme of the tenant for life, and it is not urged against the scheme either that it is ultra vires for a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts or that it has been conceived in bad faith. There can be no question but that this is a matter on which capital money arising under the Settled Land Acts may be properly applied:

Settled Land Act 1882, s. 21 (x.).

They referred also to

Sects. 22, 26, 25, and 31, sub-s. 1 (v.);

Re Lord Coleridge's Settlement, 73 L. T. Rep. 206; (1895) 2 Ch. 704.

The trustees in this case act upon a certificate, and it is irrelevant to consider here the nature of the improvement. That is a matter for the trustees. They stand in a fiduciary position. They are practically managers of the estate. The Settled Land Act 1890, s. 15, points in the same direction. It enables the court to authorise the expenditure of capital moneys on improvements although no scheme has been submitted to the trustees. Sect. 26, sub-sect. 2, of the Settled Land Act 1882 clearly shows that the duty of determining whether or not capital moneys shall be applied in any improvement is imposed by statute on the tenant for life and the trustees:

Re Partington; Reigh v. Kane, 86 L. T. Rep. 194; (1902) 1 Ch. 71.

The remainderman can only successfully resist such an application if he can show (1) that the improvement contemplated is not within the improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts; (2) that the tenant for life is not acting bonâ fide.

C. E. E. Jenkins, K.C. and H. S. Preston for the trustees.

Danckwerts, K.C., and G. Henderson for the remainderman.—The tenant for life and the trustees between them are responsible under sect. 53 for acting properly in reference to the making of any improvement. All the sub-clauses of sect. 26, sub-sect. 2, have the same effect as to legalising the application of capital moneys. When, therefore, the trustees have been directed or authorised by the court to apply a specified portion of the capital money on an improvement, they are thenceforward protected by the order. It is, therefore, right that they should satisfy the court that the scheme is in all respects proper:

Upjohn, K.C. replied.

FARWELL, J.—This is an application by a tenant for life for an order of the court directing or authorising the trustees to apply the sum of 2300*l.* out of capital moneys in their hands, after a scheme has been approved by them for the making, not of a road, but for the making of the part on which that sum has been expended. The question that I have to determine on the construction of the Act is whether it is sufficient for the tenant for life and the trustees to come here and say, "Here is the scheme approved, and this money has been spent; be good enough to make an order directing or authorising the trustees to pay a specified portion of capital money accordingly." To that I say I quite agree, if the court has no other function to perform than to make an order on being satisfied, that the scheme has been approved and the money spent. Mr. Danckwerts, however, who appears for the next remainderman, opposes, and says that he wishes to go into evidence to show that the scheme is improvident. I should say that there is no question here of the scheme being ultra vires or mali fide; but Mr. Danckwerts wishes to go into evidence to show that the scheme is improvident; that the general trend of the tenant for life's action in respect to the management of the estate has been to a too speedy development, to the great detriment of the same. That is the case that he wishes to put forward, and I have had lengthy affidavits of surveyors read to me, and the result is that if I have to determine this question of fact, it is perfectly impossible to do so on the affidavits, and I must see the witnesses in the box. The question now is whether under the Act of Parliament I have to be satisfied as to the facts or not. Now, there is no doubt but that the Settled Land Act 1882 has given to tenants for life very large powers that they never had before. Under sect. 3 they have general power to sell the fee simple of the land of their own free will without the consent of the trustees and without the order of any court. That is qualified by sect. 15, which negatives the sale of the mansion-house without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court. That has been repealed by the Act of 1890 and replaced by sect. 10 of that Act. It is also qualified by sect. 37 of the Act, which says that no sale or purchase of chattels under that section—that is, the heirloom section—shall be made without an order of the court. The tenant for life has therefore in these two cases, when he wishes to deal with the settled land, to get an order of the court. He has also (I think it is under sect. 53) to have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and he is, as regards the exercise of those powers, in the position of a trustee. When the settled land has been sold, the next question which arises is what is to be done with the purchase money; and that is provided for by a series of sections, beginning with sect. 21. A number of investments are specified; first of all, Government securities and trust securities; the discharge of incumbrances on the settled estate; the payment for any improvement authorised by the Act; payment for equality of exchange; for the purchase of the seignory of any part of the settled land being freehold, or in the purchase of the fee simple of any part of the settled land being copyhold; in the purchase of the freehold reversion of any part that is leasehold, and so on; and in the purchase of land in fee simple or copyhold, or of mines and minerals; in the payment to a person absolutely entitled in payment of costs, charges, and expenses; and, lastly, in any other mode in which money produced by the exercise of a power of sale in the settlement is applicable thereunder. All these matters are at the discretion of the tenant for life. The extent of the duties which the trustees will have to perform in considering the desirability of the investments proposed by the tenant for life has been recently dealt with by the court in Lord Coleridge's case and the other cases cited by Mr. Upjohn before the Court of Appeal. Sect. 22 provides that "capital money arising under this Act shall, in order to its being invested or applied as aforesaid, be paid either to the trustees of the settlement or into court at the option of the tenant for life, and shall be invested or applied by the trustees or under the direction of the court, as the case may be, accordingly." The tenant for life has therefore the option of saying whether the money shall be paid to the trustees or into court. Then sub-sect. 2 says: "The investment or other application by the trustees shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, and, in default thereof, according to the discretion of the trustees; but in the last-mentioned case subject to any consent required or direction given by the settlement with respect to the investment or other application by the trustees of trust money of the settlement, and any investment shall be in the names or under the control of the trustees." The tenant for life therefore has power to direct the expenditure, and, as in the case to which I have just referred, the mode in which the money shall be invested or applied. Then, when you come to deal with the improvements, you find a fresh fasciculus of clauses put under Part 7 of the Act, beginning with sect. 25. The improvements are described. They are very numerous, and I will not go through them; but new roads made for the development of land and building estates are amongst them. Then there comes sect. 26: "Where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money arising under this Act shall be applied in or towards payment for an improvement authorised by this Act, he may submit for approval to the trustees of the settlement or to the court as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement, showing the proposed expenditure thereon." Then sub-sect. 2 says: "Where the capital money to be expended is in the hands of the trustees," then "after a scheme is approved by them [that is this case] the trustees may apply that money in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or operation comprised in the improvement on (1) a certificate of the Land Commissioners [now the Board of Agriculture] certifying that the work or operation, or some specified part thereof, has been properly executed, and what amount is properly payable by the trustees in respect thereof, which certificate shall be conclusive in favour of the trustees as an authority and discharge for any payment made by themselves in pursuance thereof; or on (2) a like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the trustees and approved by the commissioners or by the court, which certificate shall be conclusive as aforesaid; or on (3) an order of the court directing or authorising the trustees to apply a specified portion of the capital money." Now, it will be observed that, with regard to those first two sub-clauses of sub-sect. 2, they deal with matters of fact—that is to say, with an examination, whether the work has been properly executed, which is a matter which will be best seen to by some able practical surveyor, or a man of experience of that sort; and that the amount is properly payable by the trustees in respect thereof. These are matters of fact, and are not matters of law. With respect to those two matters, the trustees get a discharge for any payment made by them on the certificate. But then there is the third sub-head, an order of the court. Now, I cannot think that the intention was merely to put in a formal application to the court, asking the court to make an order which would have the effect of the certificate of the able, practical surveyor, and nothing more than that. I cannot resist the conviction that, inasmuch as these improvements are of a very expensive nature and so require a very considerable amount of discretion, it has been thought advisable to insert a provision by which, although the trustees may have approved the scheme and although the tenant for life may direct the money to be so employed, it is competent for any person to bring the matter before the court—not first to act on either of these two certificates. That is really the case. If the trustees had chosen to obtain the certificate of an able, practical surveyor or other person mentioned in the 2nd sub-section, the matter could only have been brought before the court by the remainderman challenging the proceedings, as something which ought not to have been done. But if, as the case now is, the tenant for life and the trustees together—when I say together I mean agreeing together—not joining in the application are asking the court to make an order, electing themselves not to rely on any certificate for reasons which may or may not be excellent, then I think that the court has cast upon it a discretion which I think is exceedingly difficult to discharge—namely, a discretion to see whether the remainderman has, in fact, well-founded grounds for saying that the improvements are, although honestly intended, so utterly wrong-headed that they ought not to be sanctioned. I think that what Byrne J. said in the case Re Duke of Norfolk's Parliamentary Estates, cited to me by Mr. Danckwerts, throws some light on this. His Lordship says (1900) 1 Ch., at pp. 467, 468: "The scheme of the Act is to give wide powers to the tenant for life and to give power of consent to the trustees, upon the footing that they will act fairly in the exercise of their respective powers, and that neither trustees nor the court will sanction schemes which are improvident or which will unduly fetter any discretion which ought to be exercised at a later date, and there is always this safeguard, that tenants for life and trustees joining in improvident schemes, or not acting with a due regard to the interest of remaindermen, are running the risk of the possibility of the establishment of a personal liability against themselves." I can only say that, if this be so, the court cannot make an order under sub-sect. 3 without excluding any such claim of personal liability, because, if the payment is made under the order of the court, it is impossible, while that order stands, for any remainderman to challenge such payment. Neither the trustees nor the tenant for life or anybody else is liable for having made it. It is quite true that there is some slip in the report of what Chitty J. said about this in Clarke v. Thornton, but I think that he was referring to this particular section, and I think that the view that he expresses explains his ideas as to the meaning of this particular section. At p. 313 of 35 Ch. Div., his Lordship says, referring to sect. 26: "If the money had been in the hands of trustees, it appears to me that the tenant for life might have said: 'It is my option that these capital moneys shall be applied on improvements under the Act.' If he had done that, it would have been his duty to submit, under the 26th section, a scheme to the trustees." Then his Lordship reads from sect. 26 and sect. 22, sub-sect. 2, and says: "If the tenant for life was desirous of exercising his option in the manner I have mentioned, he would have had to submit a scheme to the trustees, and the trustees, in my opinion, notwithstanding this discretionary trust, might, without breach of duty, have acceded to the application and approved of his scheme." Then his Lordship goes on to use some words which look as if he were referring to the later sections and not to this: "But they might have thought, for some reason or other, that it was more safe for them to have the sanction of the court; and consequently they might have declined to approve of the scheme, unless there was an order of the court directing or authorising them, under the 3rd sub-section of the 2nd sub-section of sect. 26, to apply the capital money in that manner"; and, inasmuch as that section only applies after the scheme has been approved, I think it is only fair to say that there must be some slip in this report; but what the learned judge really meant to say was not merely that not only might the trustees have objected to approve the scheme, but that they might have declined to act on any certificate under sub-sect. (i.) or sub-sect. (ii.) of sub-sect. 2, and said that they required an order of the court. They might have thought that, for some reason or other, it was safer for them to have the sanction of the court; they might have said: "So far as we are concerned, we are satisfied; we sanction the scheme, but we know that the remainderman in this case is objecting, and therefore we do not choose to act on the certificate, and we must invite you to apply to the court for an order." That being so, it seems to me that the court is driven to exercise the discretion which the Legislature has conferred upon it, and to do the best that it can to see whether this proposed mode of managing the estate is or is not compatible with due regard to the interest of all parties. There is a difficulty, no doubt, in this view, created by the language of sect. 31, which authorises the tenant for life to enter into a contract relating to the execution of any improvement authorised by the Act. It appears to me that that may very well be got over by supposing that it applies to the great majority of cases where the tenant for life does contract, and where no question may arise and an order of the court is not sought for. When an order of the court has to be obtained, it appears to me that any such contract must be at the risk of the tenant for life. The result is that I think I have to be satisfied as to the scheme, and I will take the evidence to-morrow.

K.B. Div.] LONDON SCHOOL BOARD (apps.) v. FULHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL (resps.). [K.B. Div.]

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, Dec. 16, 1903.

(Before Lord ALVERSTON, C.J., LAWRENCE and KENNEDY, JJ.)

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD (apps.) v. FULHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL (resps.). (a)

Metropolis — New drainage — Removal of old disused drains — By-law or regulation and direction — Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 76, 83.

By regulation 29 of the respondents all disused drains were to be broken up and destroyed, and the materials and foul earth removed and dry earth, ballast, or brick rubbish substituted.

By sect. 83 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 a penalty is provided if any drain thereinbefore mentioned is found not to have been provided according to the directions or regulations of the respondents.

The appellants constructed new drains, which were connected with the respondents' sewer. On the premises were old disused drains which were not physically joined or connected with the new drains. The old drains were not taken out. Held, that the regulation was rightly made, and the appellants were properly convicted for constructing the new drain not in accordance with the directions of the respondents.

CASE STATED.

The appellants are the School Board for London and the respondents are the council of the metropolitan borough of Fulham.

On the 13th Feb. and the 15th May 1902 the appellants appeared to answer a complaint made by John Charles Jackson, medical officer of health for the respondents, for that they, being the owners of certain premises known as the Everington-street Board School, in the borough, did, when reconstructing the drainage thereat, make and provide the drains and connected work and apparatus at the premises not according to the directions of the council of the metropolitan borough of Fulham, whereby the defendants, the present appellants, were, in pursuance of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, s. 83, directed that in making and providing the drains and connected works and apparatus all brick and other disused drains at the premises should be broken up and destroyed, and the materials forming them and all the foul and sewage-charged earth and other substances carefully removed from the premises, dry earth or ballast or brick rubbish being brought in, if necessary, in place of them, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided.

The following facts were admitted and proved:—

The vestry of the parish of Fulham had in or about the year 1894 made certain regulations and directions as to drainage of houses and buildings and the construction of water-closets in their district, which purported to be made pursuant to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 73 to 79, 82, 85; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 88; and the Public Health Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 37, 39.

Regulation and direction No. 29 is as follows:

All old brick and other disused drains shall be broken up and destroyed, and the materials forming them and all foul and sewage-charged earth and other substances carefully removed from the premises, dry earth or ballast or brick rubbish being brought in, if necessary, in place of them.

The respondents are the successors of the Fulham Vestry, and adopted and confirmed the regulations and directions.

The school board as the owners of the premises were carrying out new drainage works thereat. The premises consisted of the school buildings and playgrounds affording accommodation for 1200 children. The old drains of the premises had been laid, made, and provided by the appellants in accordance with the requirements of, and with the approval of, the Fulham Vestry about twenty years ago.

In carrying out the new drainage scheme the old drains were from 4ft. to 14ft. underground, and the playground which surrounded the school buildings and was immediately over the old drains was covered with tar paving.

It was to be taken for the purposes of this case that the new drains were not physically joined to or connected with the old disused drains, and were of themselves fit and proper.

On the 11th Dec. 1901 the respondents passed the following resolution:

(a) That all brick and other disused drains at Everington-street Board School be broken up and destroyed, and the material forming them and all foul and sewage-charged earth and other substances carefully removed from the premises, dry earth or ballast or brick rubbish being brought in, if necessary, in place of them, and that a copy of this order and requirements be served upon the School Board for London on this behalf; (b) that, in the event of the School Board for London refusing to comply with the terms of the foregoing order, the town clerk and medical officer of health be instructed to take, if necessary, legal proceedings with respect to such default.

A copy of such resolution, order, and requirement was duly served on the appellants.

In carrying out the new drainage scheme all old drains, so far as known, were taken out and removed from inside the buildings and to a distance of 8ft. from the external walls, but certain parts of the old drains were left in the ground under the playground and were not used in the new drainage scheme. They were cleaned out as far as possible without taking them up, and filled up at the ends with concrete.

These drains were constructed for use and were used until so dealt with as aforesaid, and they formed the soilpipes of the children's closets.

All the drains and other connected works of the premises were from time to time inspected on behalf of the respondents, and it was then found that the regulation and order of the respondents had not been complied with.

The contentions of both parties appear in the judgment of the magistrate, which was as follows:

By the Metropolis Management Act 1855, s. 83, in case any drain or other connected works thereinbefore mentioned be found on inspection not to have been made or provided according to the directions and regulations of the vestry, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 10l. The vestry of Fulham made and gave certain regulations and directions purporting to have been made and given under sects. 82 to 85 of the Act. Those regulations and directions having been notified to a builder, they were, in a case against him arising on sect. 76, held sufficient: (Frost v. Fulham Vestry, 82 L. T. R.p. 720; 19 Cox C. C. 519). They have since been formally adopted by the consent of the borough, which has succeeded the vestry of Fulham. Regulation and direction No. 29, that all the brick and other disused drains shall be broken up and destroyed and the matters removed from the premises, purports to have been made under the sections of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, of which the said sect. 83 is one, and the defendant school board are summoned for making and providing drains and connected works or apparatus not according to the regulations or directions of the council. The regulations or directions were given to the school board when making a new drain, and they have been required to break up a certain disused old drain near the new one. It was argued for the school board that the old drain is not a work connected therewith, and that the words "made and provided" in sect. 83 are inapplicable to the breaking up of the adjacent old drain on the premises. But, good reasons having been given for the removal of the old disused drains from the vicinity of the new ones, I think that regulation and direction No. 29 may fairly be referred to sect. 83 and treated as having been made and given under it, and that they are valid. If so, the new drain has not been made or provided according to the directions or regulations of the borough council, because the old drains have not been destroyed and removed, and the defendants are liable to a penalty.

The case having come on for argument, it was remitted by the court to the magistrate for additional facts to be found by him, which were as follows:—

On the 11th Dec. 1900 the council served intimation notices under the Public Health (London) Act 1891 on the school board that the drains at Everington-street School were defective, and on the 29th April 1901 the council served on the school board a statutory notice requiring them to relay and ventilate the drains according to the regulations of the council, and the notice was acknowledged by the school board on the following day.

On the 21st June 1901 the medical officer of health to the council, by letter of that date, inquired when the board proposed to do the redrainage works, and the school board replied on the 25th June 1901, by letter of that date to the medical officer of health, stating that the redrainage of the school had been intrusted to the London Sanitary Protection Association.

On or about the 15th July 1901 a representative of the London Sanitary Protection Association had an interview with the medical officer of health, and produced to him the plan showing the proposed reconstruction of the drainage, on which was marked, in reference to the old or then existing drains, the words "old drains to be destroyed." The medical officer of health suggested certain alterations with regard to the plan generally, which the representative undertook to make, and to amend the plan in accordance therewith. The medical officer of health subsequently received information that it was not the intention of the London Sanitary Protection Association to remove the old drains.

On the 24th July 1901 Messrs. Fleming and Co., on behalf of the London Sanitary Protection Association, wrote inclosing a plan of the proposed new drainage works at the premises, and on the 25th July 1901 the medical officer of health wrote to the secretary of the London Sanitary Protection Association, informing them that with respect to the old drains it must be clearly understood that all these must be taken up.

On the 29th July 1901 the engineer to the London Sanitary Protection Association wrote a letter to the town clerk giving certain reasons for not taking up the old drains, and, at a meeting, held on the 1st Aug. 1901, of the public health committee of the council, the last-mentioned letter was considered, and it was resolved as follows:

That the plans submitted be approved subject to the whole of the old drains proposed to be abandoned being removed and the portion proposed to be used from the boiler-house being made water-tight.

On the 2nd Aug. 1901 the engineer to the London Sanitary Protection Association was informed by the town clerk, by letter of that date, of the terms of the resolution, and that the council's regulations could not be relaxed and that the old drains must be taken up and destroyed.

On the 10th Aug. 1901 the secretary to the London Sanitary Protection Association wrote a letter to the town clerk, promising to take such steps as were necessary to comply with the council's regulations and their by-laws.

After the receipt of the last-mentioned letter, instructions were given by the medical officer of health to the council's workmen to make the necessary connections of the new drains to the council's sewer so as to enable the London Sanitary Protection Association to commence and carry on the new drainage works, and the connection was accordingly commenced on the 19th Aug. 1901 and completed on the 24th Aug. 1901.

By the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 76:

Before beginning to lay or dig out the foundation of any new house or building within any such parish or district, or to rebuild any house or building therein, and also before making any drain for the purpose of draining directly or indirectly into any sewer under the jurisdiction of the vestry or board of or for any such parish or district, seven days' notice in writing shall be given to the vestry or board by the person intending to build or rebuild such house or building or to make such drain; and every such foundation shall be laid at such level as will permit the drainage of such house or building in compliance with this Act and as the vestry or board shall order, and every such drain shall be made in such direction, manner, and form and of such materials and workmanship and with such branches thereto and other connected works and apparatus and water supply as hereinbefore mentioned and as the vestry or board shall order, and the making of every such drain shall be under the survey and control of such vestry or board; and the vestry or district board shall make their order in relation to the matters aforesaid and cause the same to be notified to the person from whom such notice was received within seven days after the receipt of such notice, and in default of such notice, or if such house, building, or drain, or branches thereto, or other connected works and apparatus and water supply, be begun, erected, made, or provided in any respect contrary to any order of the vestry or board made and notified as aforesaid or the provisions of this Act, it shall be lawful for the vestry or board to cause such house or building to be demolished or altered, and to cause such drain or branches thereto and other connected works and apparatus and water supply to be relaid, amended, or remade, or, in the event of omission, added as the case may require, and to recover the expenses thereof from the owner thereof in the manner hereinafter provided.

And by sect. 83:

In case any drain . . . or other connected works or apparatus hereinbefore mentioned be found, on inspection, not to have been made or provided according to the directions or regulations of the vestry or district board or contrary to the provisions of this Act, or in case any person, without the consent of the vestry or district board, construct, rebuild, or unstop any sewer, drain . . . which may have been ordered by them not to be made, or to be demolished or stopped up, or in case any person discontinue any water supply or destroy any connected works or apparatus as aforesaid, or in case any person, without the consent of the vestry or district board, break into any sewer vested in such vestry or board, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 10*l.*; and in case the person so making any sewer, drain . . . which may have been ordered to be demolished or stopped up, or discontinuing any water supply or destroying any connected works or apparatus as aforesaid, or breaking into any sewer as aforesaid do not within fourteen days after notice in writing by the vestry or board cause such sewer, drain . . . to be altered or reinstated in conformity with the directions of the vestry or board, or, as the case may be, to be demolished or stopped up . . . or such connected works or apparatus to be restored, then and in every such case the vestry or board may cause the work to be done, and the expenses thereof shall be paid by the person who has so offended.

George Elliott for the appellants.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Courthope-Munroe for the respondents.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The restatement of this case has removed the only doubt that existed in the mind of any member of the court on the last occasion. What has been really proved before us now was stated partly by Mr. Courthope-Munroe and partly by Mr. Danckwerts, but it was very properly objected that it was not raised in the case. As I understand, the position was this: There was a drainage system of very complicated character. There were privies for both boys and girls in the middle of the yard. There were a number of old drains underneath the yard, and the school board most properly determined, there being a nuisance with these old closets, to remodel it in a way which partly used for some purposes, with some manholes, the old drainage system, and all the pipes shown in blue on the plan we have seen were drains reused for the rain and surface water. Of course it is very important that even with regard to those drains they should be in a proper condition. That is all that need be said as to that. As to pipes marked red on the plan—the new drains—they were laid, and then there were many other hundred of feet of old drains that were left in the grounds. A portion of them were taken up—up to 8ft. from the building and under the building—and therefore, of course, the question of what should be removed had to be considered, because the plans were submitted with the suggestion that a portion of the old drains should be taken up. Then the others were ultimately cleansed and sealed off. Of course the fact that they had to be dealt with in that way shows that some judgment as to what ought to be done had to be brought to bear upon the subject. In that state of things the school board have to come under sect. 76 and have to ask permission to lay the new drains connected with the sewer. That being so, this section provides for it being done in accordance with the directions that are given. Now, I only wish to speak for myself, because I may be going perhaps further than my brothers do. I think regulation 29 is a perfectly reasonable and proper regulation, and one which, in that state of things, the authority is entitled to consider. It says: "All old brick and other disused drains shall be broken up and destroyed, and the materials forming them and all foul and sewage-charged earth and other substances carefully removed from the premises, dry earth or ballast or brick rubbish being brought in, if necessary, in place of them." In my opinion, when they applied to the Fulham authority, the respondents, under sect. 76, it was perfectly competent for them to say: "But mind, if you do this, you have got to obey regulation 29." But they went a great deal further than that. They actually presented a plan with a statement that the old drains were going to be taken up, and although I do not think it is quite right to speak of it as a contractual arrangement, I do not know why that should not be one form in which the permission may be given. It is a condition of the sanctioning of the plans that the old drains are to be taken up, and when the agents of the school board, I daresay perfectly bonâ fide, changed their minds and thought they could do it equally well without taking them up, they wrote a long letter to the respondents on behalf of the school board, asking that they might not be bound to take them up, because there was no danger to health, and there had been no smell nor sufficient ground for taking them up. That being considered by the public health committee of the council, there is a formal resolution that the plans submitted be approved subject to the whole of the old drains proposed to be abandoned being removed. Under those circumstances it seems to me that the one point that was made on behalf of the appellants on the last hearing, that this was the removal of something which had no connection with the old drains (because, as Mr. Elliott pressed on us to-day, what was left in the ground was disused and in no way connected with or physically joined to or united with what was put in the ground), and that, that being so, there was no jurisdiction in the respondents to impose the condition, has gone. I am clearly of opinion that the approval of the plans obtained under sect. 76 might be coupled either with the observance of the regulation (which I think, for anything which has been argued before me, is perfectly reasonable), and with the express condition that, if the plans are sanctioned, it is subject to some work being done in connection with these old drains which are being changed, and I only wish to adopt the argument of Mr. Danckwerts that the conditions as to the materials that may be allowed to be used, where the manholes are to be, and whether or not there should be any protection against possible leakage in the drains are all matters which have to be considered or might have to be considered differently according as to whether the old drains are left in the ground or not. I am of opinion that the view taken by the learned magistrate is quite right, and the further facts which have been stated in consequence of questions put by the court and agreed to at the time by the two learned counsel have made the matter clear and removed the only doubt that ever existed in the mind of any member of the court. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

[K.B. Div.]

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I wish to add some remarks because I do not feel, and I have not felt, so clear about this matter as my brethren. I admit that we have to deal with this according to the strict letter of the law. I certainly do not dissent from their view, and I am not prepared to say I cannot agree with it. It is to be borne in mind and it is important, it seems to me, in these magisterial proceedings to see exactly what is the charge. Now, the charge before the magistrate was, as he states it in the case: "That the appellants appeared before me to answer a complaint made by John Charles Jackson, medical officer of health for the metropolitan borough of Fulham, for that they, being the owners of certain premises known as the Everington-street Board School, in the said borough, did when reconstructing the drainage thereat make and provide the drains and connected apparatus at the said premises not according to the directions of the council of the metropolitan borough of Fulham," and so on. It appears, as I understand the restatement of the case, that what was relied upon was this regulation No. 29. Now, if it had rested there, I should not have been content to leave the matter where it was left by Mr. Danckwerts in his argument, but what in substance I think is covered by the complaint is that there was a breach of sect. 83. I think, on the whole, that it does cover, not merely regulation No. 29, but it appears to cover also the directions which it is in the power of the authority to give under sect. 76. It seems to me, according to regulation No. 29, that in every case all that which has to be done would have, at any rate, required consideration as to its applicability or its propriety to a case of this kind in which they were seeking really to put in a new system of drainage in substitution of the old. Under sect. 76, it seems to me that they have power in each separate case to give directions where drains have to be made before making any drains. The words are: "For the purpose of draining directly or indirectly into any sewer under the jurisdiction of the vestry or board." That means the authority has the power to say how that shall be done, and, although I can see considerable danger in making terms which may cause very great expense, against the imposition of which it is difficult to struggle, and in regard to which they may not be matters directly connected with drains, I think in this case what was ordered to be done in the removal of the old drains altogether and everything connected with them may be fairly brought within those words of sect. 76 which give the power to insist upon those terms and conditions. Therefore I do not dissent from the judgment, but I do so expressly on that ground. But to say, quite apart from a direction in a particular case, that in all cases where new drainage works are to be put into a place "all old brick and other disused drains shall be broken up and destroyed and the materials removed, together with all foul and sewage-charged earth, dry earth or ballast or brick rubbish being brought in, if necessary, in place of it," is rather severe, if it is intended to be applied in all circumstances and without modification as an absolute regulation of the authorities. I think in this particular case it is clear that, whether you call it contractual or otherwise, it would be contractual as regards the engineering body who were employed by this school board, it becomes effectual as a direction under sect. 76 as regards the body employing them, which is here the school board. Under the special terms that were made in this case, I am not prepared to dissent from the view which I think my Lord and my brother Lawrance, J. hold is the true one—namely, that the direction under sect. 76 covers what was ordered to be done in this case, and which the school board has not complied with.

CLAYTON AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. PEIRSE (resp.). (a)

Fishery — By-law — "Description of nets" — Salmon Fishery Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), s. 39 (3).

Under sect. 39 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873 "a board of conservators may make by-laws . . . for all or any of the following purposes . . . (3) to determine the length, size, and description of nets."

A by-law made under this section forbade the use of certain particular kinds of nets by name in parts of the fishery district, and then gave a definition and description of these nets.

Held, that the by-law was not ultra vires. The word "description" in sect. 39 (3) is not confined to the characteristics of any particular kind of net.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellants under a by-law made by the Board of Conservators for the Wye Fishery District pursuant to the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Acts 1861 to 1892 on the 27th Feb. 1901, and confirmed by the Board of Trade on the 27th Feb. 1902, for that they (the appellants) in the river Wye, above a line drawn across that river along the lower side of Bigawear Bridge (that river then being within a fishery district formed under the above-mentioned Acts) unlawfully used a net other than a beating net—namely, a draft or seine net—for taking salmon in that part of the river, contrary to the by-law duly made in that behalf.

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved:

That the by-laws in force on the 13th May 1903 in the Wye Fishery District included the by-law under which the information was laid.

That the appellants John Clayton and Sidney Thomas on the 13th May 1903 at Goodrich unlawfully used a net other than a beating net—namely, a draft or seine net—for taking salmon in that part of the river wherein the use of such net was prohibited by the by-law.

On the part of the appellants, the use of the draft or seine net was admitted, but it was

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

CLAYTON AND ANOTHER (apps) v. PEIRSE (resp.).

contended that they were the servants of Charles Haines, the lessee of the Huntsham Ferry and Salmon Fishery, within which the appellants used the net, and that Charles Haines held a licence granted by the Wye Board of Conservators to use a draft net, for which licence he had paid 5*l.*; that the only net which the new by-laws allowed in that fishery was a beating net, which was practically impossible, useless, and unremunerative, and that in only allowing a beating net the conservators were allowing a net which would be of no use at any time in a considerable part of the middle fisheries of the river, including the Huntsham Fishery, and in wet seasons in no part of the middle fisheries; that the by-law was in restraint of trade; that the by-law was unfair, because it injured the middle waters of the river Wye, including the Huntsham Fishery, for the advantage of the owners of the upper waters and of the tidal waters of the Wye thereby unduly favouring certain parts of the river at the expense of another part; that the by-law was unnecessary, because it had not been proved that there had been any decrease of salmon in the river; that the by-law was unreasonable, because to allow a beating net, which was practically of no utility and to prohibit the use of a draft net, the accustomed form of net theretofore used in the Huntsham Fisheries, amounted to a total prohibition of net fishing in a large proportion of the middle fisheries of the river, including the Huntsham Salmon Fisheries; that the by-law was invalid and contrary to law as being ultra vires, having regard to the true construction of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873 and particularly to sect. 30 of the Act of 1873, sub-ss. 3, 8, 11, and 12, and sect. 40 of the Act of 1873.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the by-law was good and was not ultra vires, and that the beating net could be used with profit in the waters above Bigweir Bridge, including the Huntsham Fishery; that the Huntsham Fishery extended only for a short distance in the river above Bigweir Bridge; that the use therein of a draft net injured all the fisheries above the Huntsham Fishery; that by the by-law the Huntsham Fishery was improved for rod and line fishing; that Charles Haines had renewed his lease of the Huntsham Fishery after the making of the by-law and with full knowledge of it; that, having been specially warned that the licence to use a draft net would be of no use to him, he insisted on taking out the licence, and that there was no power under the Acts to refuse him the licence if he demanded it: (see sect. 34 of the Act of 1865, sub-sect. 5).

Upon the above contentions and on the evidence produced before the justices by the parties, they found the following facts: (a) That the bye-law under which the appellants were convicted was a good and valid by-law, and not ultra vires; (b) that the by-law was reasonable, having been approved after a public inquiry at which all the fishing interests in the river were or might have been represented; (c) that the draft net was used contrary to the by-law; (d) that the appellants were using the net as servants to Charles Haines; (e) that they and Charles Haines were not protected by the licence, as he took it out after warning that it was illegal to use it in the Huntsham Fishery, and the licence was limited to waters in which and at the times at which he is otherwise entitled so to fish; (f) that the Wye Fishery Board had no dispensing power and could not issue a valid licence to fish contrary to their own by-laws: (Yabbicom v. King, 80 L. T. Rep. 159: (1899) 1 Q. B. 444).

They therefore convicted the appellants.

The question upon which the opinion of the court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law in holding that the by-law in question was a valid by-law, and that they rightly convicted.

By the Salmon Fishery Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), s. 39:

Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained for the confirmation and publication of the by-laws, a board of conservators may make by-laws for the better execution of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, and for the better protection, preservation, and improvement of the salmon fisheries within their district, and alter the same from time to time for all or any of the following purposes—that is to say: . . . (3) To determine the length, size, and description of nets and the manner of using the same (not being fixed engines) for taking salmon, provided that no by-law made under the authority of this section shall limit the length of a hang net or limit the length of a draft net so as to be less than 200 yards . . . (8) To prohibit the use of nets within a certain district of the mouth of any river, and of the point of confluence of rivers in any part of the district (not being a fishery) and to erect and fix posts, buoys, and landmarks to indicate such distances respectively.

And by sect. 40:

A board of conservators may make any by-law to supply to the whole or to any part or parts of their district, and to the whole or any part or parts of the year, and may from time to time by any new by-law revoke, vary, or alter, either in whole, in part, or as to its application to the whole or to any part or parts of the district any by-law previously made, and may from time to time vary any by-law made in respect of the whole or any part or parts of the district, and may from time to time except or exclude from the operation of all or any of the by-laws any part or parts of the district to the whole or other parts of the district.

By-law 2 of the Board of Conservators of the Wye Fishery District provided:

The length, size, and description of nets and the manner of using the same (not being fixed engines) which may be lawfully used for taking salmon in the Wye Fishery District shall be as follows: (a) In that part of the said district which includes so much of the river Wye as lies below a line drawn across the said river Wye along the lower side of the Bigweir Bridge, together with all tributaries of the said river flowing into it below such line, the description of such nets shall be draft or seine nets, beating nets and lave nets, as hereinafter determined. Draft or seine nets shall be unarmoured nets consisting of a single sheet or wall of netting not more than 200 yards in length, measured along the head-rope when wet, and not more than 8 yards in depth, and shall be used by holding one end of the net on the shore or bank, and by shooting the net from a boat which shall start from such shore or bank, and return without delay to such shore or bank from which it started, and then draw in the net on to such shore or bank. Each draft or seine net shall be fully drawn in and landed at least twenty minutes before another net is shot or begun to be shot within 100 yards from any point along the line of shot of the first net. Beating nets shall be nets made with a linnet or inner net armed on one or both sides with walling-out holes or armour, and shall not exceed 40 yards in length, measured along the head-rope when wet, and 8 yards in depth, and shall be used by extending the same from a point at or near one bank of the river to another point at or near the same bank, and by driving therein the fish which may have been thereby inclosed. No portion of any such net shall be in the water for more than thirty minutes at one time. Lave nets shall be nets suspended so as to form a bag or purse from a wooden frame consisting of a pole or handstaff or handle with two movable arms, each not more than 5ft. 6in. in length, and having a space of not more than 7ft. 6in. between their outer extremities when fully extended; each such net shall be used by one person only, who shall place or hold the same in the water and lift or scoop the fish that may be inclosed therein. No such net shall be used by any person within a distance of less than six yards from any other person using another net. (b) In all other parts of the said district except as aforesaid and until the 16th day of August 1906 inclusive the description of such nets shall be beating nets, as above described, to be used in manner above mentioned. Any person using any net (not being a fixed engine) of any other length, size, or description than as above determined, or using any net (not being a fixed engine) in any other manner than as above determined and described respectively shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*.

By the by-laws the licence for a draft or seine net was 5*l*. and for a beating net 20*l*.

Robson, K.C. (J. Lloyd with him) for the appellants.—This by-law is made under the powers conferred on the board of conservators by sect. 39 (3) of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873, which allows a by-law to be made to determine the length, size, and description of nets. This by-law purports to prohibit the use of a particular kind of net and is ultra vires, for the word "description" means the characteristics of the net. A by-law therefore made under this power may only authorise a net with a particular mesh, but it cannot prohibit a particular net. If sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 bore the interpretation the respondent contends there would be no necessity for sub-sect. 8. The by-law is also oppressive, as it compels a fisherman to pay 20*l*. for a licence instead of 5*l*. If the by-law is good it practically prevents net fishing where it applies.

W. D. Benson for the respondent.—The word "description" means "kind," and the by-law is good. The board of conservators can forbid any particular kind of net to be used in a particular part of the fishery. The nets in the by-law are both named and described.

Robson, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We are asked to say that this by-law, made under sect. 39 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873 is ultra vires and unreasonable; but, as was pointed out in Kruse v. Johnson (78 L. T. Rep. 647; (1898) 2 Q. B. 91) a strong case must be made out to support that contention. Under that section the conservators have power to make by-laws for determining the length, size, and description of nets, and by sect. 40 they can apply these by-laws to any part of their district. In this case they have said that below a certain point certain nets may be used, but above that point only beating nets can be used. Whether they have the right to make such a by-law depends upon whether they can say that a particular kind of net may not be used as regards the whole river. It is said that sub-sect. 3, of sect. 39, which enacts that the board may make by-laws "to determine the length size, and description of nets and the manner of using the same," does not give any such power, and that the conservators, by their by-law, cannot prohibit the use of a particular kind of net, but only the length, size, or make of such net. I do not think that the word "description" means description of a particular kind of net, but I think the conservators can prohibit the use of any kind of net altogether. In my opinion "description" means kind, as comparing one kind with another. This is borne out by the proviso to sub-sect. 3, which regulates the limitations of hang nets and draught nets, and that suggests that hang net and draught net may be descriptions of nets within the section. I think that if we were to hold that the conservators could not prohibit the use of a particular kind of net altogether, that would be cutting down their powers unduly. It is further said that sub-sect. 3 cannot give them this power, because, by sub-sect. 8, the conservators may prohibit the use of nets altogether in certain places. However, sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 and sect. 40 give power to the conservators to deal with nets all over the river, and I think sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 ought to be construed as giving them power to make this by-law. It is further said that if this by-law is upheld that will practically prohibit fishing, because the licence for a beating net is four times as much as for a draft net. A by-law, however, cannot be ultra vires because it allows a net to be used, the duty on which is four times as much as a net which is forbidden.

LAWRENCE, J. agreed.

KENNEDY, J.—In order to be a good by-law it must be shown that it was made under the powers given by sect. 39 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873. It is said that the word description in sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 does not allow the conservators to prohibit the use of a particular kind of net altogether, but only allows them to make a by-law with regard to the characteristics of the various nets. There is no reason, however, why description should not mean the generic description as well as the particular characteristics of nets. I think that the by-law can say that a particular description of net may not be used, and it may further describe what a particular net shall be. There is no reason why the word "description" should be limited to the description of the characteristics of the net. A by-law under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 39 could, by setting out the characteristics of a net which is forbidden, prohibit the use of that net altogether, and so the by-law could forbid the use of a net described by enumerating its characteristics, but not if it were merely called by its name. If the arguments of the appellants were sound, the by-law would be good if the net were described without naming it, but ultra vires if it named it without describing it. There is no conflict between sub-sects. 3 and 8 of sect. 39, and they are not inconsistent, and I do not see how the powers given under sub-sect. 8 can make a by-law under sub-sect. 3 ultra vires. Appeal dismissed.

Tuesday, Jan. 12.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. and KENNEDY, J.)DIXON v. BRADFORD AND DISTRICT RAIL-WAY SERVANTS' COAL SUPPLY SOCIETY LIMITED. (a)*Landlord and tenant—Tenancy—"Three months' notice . . . to terminate agreement"— Tenancy from year to year.Premises were let to the defendants "at an inclusive rental of 25l. per annum from the 1st Oct.
1894. The company to pay rates and taxes in addition. Three months' notice on either side to terminate this agreement."Held, that the tenancy was a yearly one terminable by three months' notice at the end of a year of the tenancy.*APPEAL from His Honour Judge Bompas sitting at the Bradford County Court.The action was brought to recover one quarter's rent from the 1st Jan. 1903 to the 31st March

The tenancy agreement was as follows:

*Agreement for letting house and shop.—The Bradford and District Railway Servants' Coal Supply Society limited to have the tenancy of the house and shop 24 and 24A, Wakefield-road and Regent-square at an inclusive rental of 25l. per annum from the 1st Oct. 1894.
The company to pay rates and taxes in addition. Three months' notice on either side to terminate this agreement.
—Sept. 14, 1894.*Notice purporting to determine this agreement was given by letter dated the 24th Sept. 1902 as follows:*I beg to give you three months' notice that we shall cease the tenancy of the premises No. 24, Wakefield-road.*The County Court judge found for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

*Naldrett for the plaintiff, the appellant.—The notice to quit was bad whether this was a yearly or a quarterly tenancy. If it was the latter, then, as the tenancy commenced on the 1st Oct., the three months' notice must expire then or at some period of three months from that date, and not on the usual quarter days. It was decided in *Kemp
v. Derrett* (3 Camp. 510; 14 R. R. 828) that where premises are taken under an agreement by which the "tenant is always to be subject to quit at three months' notice," this constitutes a quarterly tenancy which may be determined by a three months' notice to quit, expiring at the same time of the year it commenced, or any corresponding quarter day. Further, although the tenant under such an agreement enters in the middle of one of the usual quarters, if there appears to be no agreement to the contrary, he will be presumed to hold from the day he enters, and the notice can only be determined by a notice expiring that day of the year, or some other quarter day calculated therefrom. That case shows that this notice is bad even if this is a quarterly tenancy, but I submit that on the true construction of the agreement this is a tenancy from year to year, but instead of, as is usual, being terminable by a six months' notice, all that is required is a three months' notice which must expire on the day of the year when the tenancy commenced. Wherethe rent is expressed to be reserved at so much a year, the presumption is that the tenancy is a yearly one, although that presumption may be rebutted by other parts of the instrument. But here the provision as to rates and taxes supports that presumption. He referred toWilkinson v. Hall*, 3 Bing. N. C. 508; 43 R. R.
728;Doe d. King v. Grafton, 18 Q. B. 496;Fox on Landlord and Tenant, p. 3, 3rd edit.As to the date when the notice ought to expire, Doe d. Spicer v. Lea (11 East, 312) and *Sidebotham
v. Holland* (72 L. T. Rep. 62; (1895) 1 Q. B. 378) are in point. In Doe d. Pitcher v. Donovan (1 Taunt.
555; 2 Camp. 78) it was held that on the letting of a house from year to year "to quit at quarter's notice," the quarter must expire with a year of the tenancy. There the premises were let from Michaelmas 1802 at 50l. a year. In *Soames v.
Nicholson* (85 L. T. Rep. 614; (1902) 1 K. B. 157) the words were, "subject to three months' notice on either side at any time to terminate," while in Kemp v. Derrett (sup.) they were, "always to be subject." These cases are very different from the present, and I submit that the learned County Court judge was wrong.*Geoffrey Ellis for the defendants, the respondents.—The tenancy here being subject to "three months' notice on either side to terminate this agreement," the notice can be given at any time.
In Doe d. King v. Grafton (18 Q. B. 496) the premises were let at a yearly rent payable quarterly, "until one of the said parties should give the other six calendar months' notice to quit," and it was held that notice might be given to quit at the expiration of any six months. He also referred toDoe d. Williams and Ayrane v. Smith*, 5 Adol. & El. 350; 44 R. R. 442;*Chambre, J. in Doe d. Pitcher v. Donovan (sup.) points out that it is only if the tenancy is from year to year that the quarter's notice must end with the year, but if the demise was for one year only and then to continue tenant afterwards and quit at a quarter's notice, then it would be a quarter ending at any time. Here the tenancy was a quarterly one, terminable at a quarter's notice, and the notice to quit was good.Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Cases which turn on the effect of notices to quit are in one sense unsatisfactory, for the court has often to apply rules of law to the construction of documents drawn up in colloquial language. There are, however, certain rules of law which show that we cannot accept the view taken by the learned County Court judge. The tenancy was in terms a yearly one, and the authorities are sufficient to establish that it would be a yearly tenancy terminable on the 1st Oct. by six months' notice, apart from the clause which says: "Three months' notice on either side to terminate this agreement."
Further, the clause as to the payment of rates and taxes rather points to a yearly tenancy, for they are paid yearly or half yearly. I think that the reasoning and language in *Doe d. Pitcher v.
Donovan* (1 Taunt. 555; 2 Camp. 78) apply here, and in that case it was in effect decided that a clause like this only cut down the period of notice from six to three months, but that no incidents of the tenancy were otherwise affected, and that the tenancy remained a yearly one and that the* term ended at the end of a year. Looking at Doe d. King v. Grafton (18 Q. B. 496), the point upon which that case was decided was not that the tenancy was not a yearly one, but that the words "until one of the said parties shall give unto the other six calendar months' notice in writing to quit" were sufficient to rebut the presumption of a yearly tenancy which would have arisen from "at the yearly rent of 42l. payable quarterly." Here there is nothing to rebut the presumption of a yearly tenancy, and we must therefore hold that the notice given was not a good notice. I hold that the tenancy is not properly determinable until the end of a year of the tenancy, and then by a three months' notice.

KENNEDY, J.—On the whole, I am of the same opinion.

SURREY COMMERCIAL DOCK COMPANY (apps.)
v. MAYOR, &C., OF BERMONDSEY (resps.). (a)

Local government—Private Act—Inconsistency with public Act—Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 76—Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894.

By a private Act of 1894 the appellants were specially authorised to do certain works and to make and maintain in connection with the works so authorised (inter alia) all necessary and proper buildings and other works on any lands within the limits of deviation.

The erection of a certain building on lands within the limits of deviation was rendered necessary by works so authorised.

Held, that the interference and control involved in sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 was inconsistent with the powers conferred by the private Act, and so the appellants were not bound to serve on the respondents a notice under that section in respect of such building.

CASE stated on a complaint charging the appellants with unlawfully and without having given seven days' notice in writing to the respondents, beginning to lay or dig out the foundation of a new building, contrary to sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1859.

The appellants are a company constituted and incorporated under the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1864 for the purpose of carrying on the undertaking defined in sect. 15 of such Act, and for executing the works authorised by such Act, and for maintaining such undertaking and works.

The docks, basins, lands, buildings, and other premises, conveniences, and works defined in sect. 15, and authorised by sect. 53 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1864, are surrounded by and contained within dock fences and gates within which the appellants have and exercise all the powers conferred upon them by the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 and the Acts incorporated with such respective Acts or amending the same.

Portions of the appellants' premises, upon which warehouses, workshops, and other buildings are erected, are entirely surrounded by water, and none of the portions so surrounded can be drained by gravitation into any sewer of the respondents outside the appellants' premises. It would, however, be possible to drain them by syphons under the locks, but this would necessitate pumping, and be very expensive.

The respondents are under and by virtue of the London Government Act 1899 the successors of the vestry of the parish of Rotherhithe, which parish now forms part of the borough of Bermondsey, where the appellants' premises are situate, and are the local authority for the purposes of sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and sects. 37 and 38 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 within the appellants' premises under certain orders hereinafter referred to.

By the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 the appellants were empowered to make and maintain the works described in sect. 4 of such Act, which works include (e) a new road (No. 1) "and sewer commencing in Swing Bridge-road and terminating in Rotherhithe Lower-road, and the raising and alteration of the levels of the Swing Bridge-road between the western end of the swing bridge and the commencement of such new road (No. 1) and sewer."

In connection with the works specially authorised by the section or any of them, the appellants were empowered by the section to make and maintain (inter alia) all necessary and proper embankments, approaches, roads, buildings, yards, and other works and conveniences, and to alter, break up, stop up, and divert any pipes, wires, tubes, sewers, drains, and other works on or under any lands within the limits of deviation shown on the deposited plans which might be acquired by or belong to them.

Pursuant to the powers conferred on them by sect. 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894, the appellants made the works mentioned in sub-par. (e) of such section, and raised the level of the Swing Bridge-road. The raising of the level of the Swing Bridge-road has rendered it necessary for the appellants to construct an inclined approach for wheeled vehicles from such road to a yard belonging to the appellants, called Tinland Yard, on the south side of the Swing Bridge-road. Such inclined approach will, when completed, occupy the site of certain buildings in the yard. The buildings consist of an engineer's office and workshop for fitters and blacksmiths, and in order to construct the approach, it is necessary that the appellants shall demolish the buildings and erect other buildings instead thereof in the yard. The appellants have demolished the engineer's office, and are about to demolish the workshop for fitters and blacksmiths. They have constructed a temporary approach from and to the Swing Bridge-road to and from the yard, and have erected a new workshop in the yard, which is to be used in connection therewith for the purposes of the appellants' undertaking instead of the fitters and blacksmiths' shop.

The appellants did not give to the respondents any notice of their intention to lay or dig out the foundation of the new buildings, but prior to erecting the same the appellants deposited with the Port of London sanitary authority detailed plans and specifications thereof. Such plans and specifications were duly approved by the port sanitary authority, and the new building was erected in conformity therewith.

Certain of the powers of a local authority under the Public Health (London) Act 1891 and the Public Health (Amendment) Act 1890 have been conferred upon the Port of London Sanitary Authority by orders of the Local Government Board under sect. 112 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, but not (inter alia) sects. 37 and 38. The port sanitary authority claims to be the local authority within the dock walls of the appellants, and on the 5th Sept. 1896 the medical officer of health of the port sanitary authority wrote to the appellants' manager a letter, of which the following is a copy :

In order to avoid any uncertainty in the minds of your officers as to the exact position of the port sanitary authority with reference to sanitary matters, I have to point out that the port sanitary authority is the local authority within the dock walls. Will you kindly give instructions to your dock officials that no sanitary works should be carried out without first submitting detailed plans and specifications thereof to this office and obtaining official sanction? Sanitary works will include all works in connection with the erection, alteration, and repair of water-closets or privies, urinals, drains, etc. Such an instruction will save the dock company much trouble and expense.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the erection of the new building was rendered necessary by the raising and alteration of the level of the Swing Bridge-road; that such erection was a work the appellants were authorised by sect. 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 to make; that the respondents had no power to control them in the exercise of their powers under that section; and that the appellants were under no obligation to serve notice on the respondents of their intention to lay or dig out the foundations of the new building under sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, that section, so far as buildings erected pursuant to their special Act were concerned, having been repealed by implication by the special Act.

In support of the appellants' contention the following cases were cited: City and South London Railway Company v. London County Council (65 L. T. Rep. 362; (1891) 2 Q. B. 513); London County Council v. London School Board (1892) 2 Q. B. 606).

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the appellants were bound to give them notice under sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, which section provides (inter alia) that before beginning to lay out or dig the foundation of any new house or building within any parish or district seven days' notice in writing shall be given to the vestry by the person intending to build such house or building; that there was no clause in the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 expressly repealing sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855; that the powers conferred by the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 nor any other Act conferring powers upon the dock company could not be held to repeal by implication sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 unless it could be shown that the two Acts were inconsistent; that there was no inconsistency in the appellants having power to erect buildings and giving the respondents the notice specified in sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855.

The following cases were quoted in support of the respondents' contention: Whitechapel Board of Works v. Crow (84 L. T. Rep. 595); Uckfield Rural District Council v. Crowborough District Water Company (81 L. T. Rep. 539; (1899) 2 Q. B. 644); Grand Junction Waterworks Company v. Hampton Urban District Council (78 L. T. Rep. 673; (1898) 2 Ch. 361); London County Council v. Wandsworth and Putney Gas Company (64 J. P. 500); and Charing Cross and Strand Electricity Supply Corporation v. Woodthorpe (88 L. T. Rep. 772).

They also contended that the contention of the port sanitary authority that they are the sole local authority with reference to sanitary matters was not true, in view of the fact that the particular powers conferred upon the port sanitary authority by the orders issued by the Local Government Board, dated the 29th March 1892, the 29th Dec. 1894, and the 30th June 1898, neither specifically excluded the powers of the respondents arising under the Metropolis Management Act 1855 nor their powers as a sanitary authority arising under the Public Health (London) Act 1891 other than those transferred by those orders. Among the powers not so transferred are the powers under sects. 37 and 38 of the Act of 1891, and it was urged on behalf of the respondents that unless they were entitled to notice under sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 buildings might be erected without the knowledge, as in the present case, and so without any opportunity on their part of securing in their construction compliance with the provisions of the sections.

The magistrates found as a fact that the new building was a building within the meaning of sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and had been erected by the appellants upon land belonging to them within the limits of deviation shown on the deposited plans referred to in sect. 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894, and that the erection of the new building had been rendered necessary by the raising and alteration of the levels of the Swing Bridge-road authorised by the last-mentioned section.

He was, however, of opinion the provisions of sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 were not inconsistent with the provisions of sect. 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894, and he therefore held that the provisions of sect. 76 of the Act of 1855 requiring notice to be given to the respondents before beginning to lay out or dig out the foundations of any buildings within that section were not repealed with regard to buildings erected by the appellants pursuant to sect. 4 of the Act of 1894, and that the appellants had been guilty of the offence alleged in the summons, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

By the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 76 :

Before beginning to dig or lay out the foundation of any new house or building within any such parish or district or to rebuild any house or building therein, and also before making any drain for the purpose of draining directly or indirectly into any sewer under the jurisdiction of the vestry or board of or for any such parish or district, seven days' notice in writing shall be given to the vestry or board by any person intending to build or rebuild such house or building or to make such drain, and every such foundation shall be laid at such level as will permit the drainage of such house or building in compliance with this Act and as the vestry or board shall order, and every such drain shall be made in such direction, manner, and form and of such materials and workmanship and with such branches thereto and other connected works and apparatus and water supply as hereinbefore mentioned and as the vestry or board shall order, and the making of every such drain shall be under the survey and control of the vestry or board; and the vestry or district board shall make their order in relation to the matters aforesaid, and cause the same to be notified to the person from whom such notice was received within seven days after the receipt of such notice, and in default of such notice or if such house, building, or drain or branches thereto or other connected works and apparatus and water supply be begun, erected, made, or provided in any respect contrary to any order of the vestry or board made and notified as aforesaid or the provisions of this Act, it shall be lawful for the vestry or board to cause such house or building to be demolished or altered, and to cause such drain or branches thereto and other connected works and apparatus and water supply to be relaid, amended, or remade or in any event of omission added as the case may require, and to recover the expenses thereof from the owner thereof in the manner hereinafter provided.

Macmorran, K.C. (R. Cunningham Glen with him) for the appellants.—The Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 authorises the appellants to execute these works, and pro tanto, so far as the appellants are concerned, sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 is repealed, and does not apply. Here the special Act and the Metropolis Management Act cannot be read together so as to harmonise, and so the later special Act impliedly repeats the former general Act:

City and South London Railway v. London County Council, 65 L. T. Rep. 362; (1891) 2 Q. B. 513;
London County Council v. London School Board (1892) 2 Q. B. 606.

When the powers of the special Act are looked at they are inconsistent with the rights of the respondents under sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and so the Surrey Commercial Dock Act 1894 governs this case. The case of Charing Cross and Strand Electricity Supply Corporation v. Woodthorpe (88 L. T. Rep. 772) does not apply, as the magistrate seems to have thought, for there the different authorities might have interfered so far as their departments were concerned, but here, even although notice was served on the respondents, they could do nothing.

Avory, K.C. (H. C. Biron with him) for the respondents.—There is no inconsistency between the special and the general Acts here, for the former only gives a general authority to build, and does not say how the buildings are to be erected. That is provided for by the general Act. In that respect the present case is different from City and South London Railway v. London County Council (sup.) and London County Council v. London School Board (sup.). There are no provisions as to drainage in the special Act. Charing Cross and Strand Electricity Supply Corporation v. Woodthorpe (sup.) applies.

Feb. 1.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment of the court:—This is a special case stated by Mr. Paul Taylor, one of the metropolitan magistrates, and raises a point of some importance under sect. 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855. The appellants are the Surrey Commercial Dock Company and the respondents the corporation of Bermondsey, the successors of the vestry of Rotherhithe. The area of the appellants' docks is within the area of the borough. The appellants are a company incorporated under the Commercial Dock Act 1864, for the purpose of carrying on the undertaking mentioned in sect. 15 of that Act. The statute of 1864 does not appear to contain any clause dealing specially with the Metropolis Management Act, unless it be sect. 125, upon which no reliance was placed by the respondents. In the year 1894 the appellants obtained statutory powers to make certain alterations in their dock premises, all of which were situated within the area of their undertaking under the Act of 1864, and by sect. 4 of the Act of 1894 the company were authorised to make and maintain, among other works, "a new road (No. 1) and sewer commencing in Swing Bridge-road and terminating in Rotherhithe Lower-road, and the raising and alteration of the levels of the Swing Bridge-road between the western end of the swing bridge and the commencement of such new road (No. 1) and sewer." This section, in enumerating the particular works, gave the company power, subject to the provisions of the Act, to make and maintain all necessary and proper sewers, drains, culverts, buildings, yards, and other works, and to alter, break up, stop up and divert any pipes, sewers, drains, and other works on or under any lands within the limits of deviation. The appellant company subsequently raised the level of the Swing Bridge-road, as they were empowered to do under this section, and constructed the new bridge, and this alteration involved the occupation of the site of certain buildings in the yard, among others a workshop for fitters. In consequence the appellants demolished the workshop for fitters, and erected a new workshop upon another site within the ambit of their dock premises such site as the plans attached to the case show, being wholly surrounded by docks. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that, prior to the commencement of digging out the foundation of the new workshop it was incumbent upon the appellants to give notice to the respondents under sect. 76 of the Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855, and that the foundations must be laid at such a level as would permit the drainage of the workshop in accordance with the Act and as the respondent board should order, and that any drain from the workshop must be constructed in accordance with the directions of the vestry under that section. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, having regard to the statutory powers already referred to, it was not incumbent upon the appellant company to give notice under sect. 76, but the power and responsibility of deciding as to any drains within the statutory area was vested in the appellant company, and that the respondents had no jurisdiction, at any rate as far as sect. 76 was concerned, in that area. Beyond the sections to which we have already referred, no direct assistance can be gathered from any other sections, but it is not unimportant to observe that sect. 19 does require notice to be given to the respondents where any work to be done by virtue of the Act of 1894 may pass over, under, or by the side of or interfere with any sewer under their control, and sect. 27 imposed restrictions with regard to the building line upon buildings erected upon land purchased by the company, and sub-sect. 8 of sect. 29 subjected any buildings erected or provided by them to the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 and the Metropolitan Management Act 1855. The learned magistrate decided that the new workshop was a building within the meaning of sect. 76, that it had been erected on land belonging to the appellants within the limits of deviation shown in the deposited plans referred to in sect. 4 of the Act of 1894, but he held that the provisions of the Act of 1894 were not inconsistent with sect. 76 of the Metropolitan Management Act 1855, and that therefore the appellants ought to have given notice. The question appears to us to be one of considerable difficulty. In favour of the respondents it may be urged that the new workshop is not a work specially authorised by the Act of 1894, but is only consequential on the demolition of the old workshop in consequence of the alteration of the Bridge-road necessitated by the raising of the level of the Swing Bridge-road; and if this be so, there does not seem to be any reason why the provisions of a general Act applicable to the area in which the proposed building is intended should not apply. Upon the other hand, it may be urged that the control of the respondents in the matter of foundations is inconsistent with the power and duty of the dock company's property to maintain the works within their area, and that the statute clearly contemplates that the duty of providing the necessary works, and of taking the proper precautions for their construction and maintenance, should rest with the dock company. In this view it would, of course, be inconsistent with this argument that the Metropolitan Board should be able to deal with the question of the depth of foundations, which might in some cases affect the stability of other works which the dock company had been authorised and empowered to maintain. In favour of the appellants the judgment in the City and South London Railway Company v. London County Council (sup.) was relied upon, and to a certain extent it is an authority in their favour. It does not, however, seem to conclude the case altogether. That was a case in which the London County Council complained that a station erected by the City and South London Railway Company did not conform with the general building line. The Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal decided that the company were not bound by the provisions of the Metropolitan Management Act in this respect, and that notwithstanding that the building could have been erected within the general line of buildings without any inconvenience, except a considerable exercise of expense. In that case the Court of Appeal held that if the buildings which the railway company were erecting were buildings necessary for the statutory purposes, it was not within the power of the county council to dictate how in particular the company should arrange their buildings, and how in particular they should construct them. That case cannot be regarded as a direct authority for the point raised in the present case, because, as we have already pointed out, the work here constructed was not a work expressly authorised as in the City and South London case, but it was only something which the company found it necessary to do in consequence of a building previously existing having been destroyed by the courts specially authorised. It is, however, found by the learned magistrate in the case that the erection of the new building had been rendered necessary by the raising and alteration of the levels of the swing bridge authorised by sect. 4 of the Act of 1894. Upon the whole we are of opinion that the principle ought to be extended to this case. It seems to us that dealing with a statutory undertaking as to which the rights and the obligations are imposed by statute upon a particular body, express enactment or a clear implication is necessary in order to transfer the responsibility to a body acting under a general statute. We think also that to a certain extent the reference to the Metropolitan Management Acts in the latter sections of the statute to which we have referred confirm this view. We, however, decide the case upon the broad principle that the interference and control involved in sect. 76 of the Metropolitan Management Act 1855 is inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the appellants under their statutory authority. It was said that this view was contrary with the decision of this court in the Charing Cross and Strand Electricity Supply Corporation v. Woodthorpe (88 L. T. Rep. 772); but when that case is examined this will not found to be so. In that case a question arose as to notice being given to a number of public authorities, and it was alleged that because the provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament gave the Board of Trade and the Postmaster-General certain rights of control over the character of the structures that excluded the necessity of complying with the provisions of the London Building Act 1894. The court decided in that case that the protection given to one class of the public by the control of those two authorities—namely, the Board of Trade and Postmaster-General—ought not to deprive the public of the protection given to them by the London Building Act 1894. That decision obviously in no way conflicts with the judgment which are giving. For the above reasons we are of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

Shipping—Pilotage—Port of Bristol—Compulsory pilot—Vessel bound from Newport to Bristol—Vessel in Newport pilotage district, but within port of Bristol—Necessity of Bristol pilot—Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 (47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxiii.), s. 9—Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. cxxxvi.), ss. 4, 29—Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. clx.), schedule, s. 3.

By the Bristol Wharfage Act 1807 it was provided in sect. 9 that all vessels navigating or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, should be piloted and navigated by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation.

By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 it was provided in sect. 4 that so much of the 9th section of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester should be repealed, and by the same Act pilotage boards and pilotage districts—which in some cases overlapped the port of Bristol—were created for the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester, and power was given to these boards to license pilots for their districts.

By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 it was provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, a vessel navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by pilots licensed by the Bristol Corporation, except when within the limits of that port, which were therein defined.

Held, that the Act of 1861 was not intended to deal with and did not deal with or include vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, although such vessels were bound from or to one of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and that therefore in the case of a vessel which is not exempt from compulsory pilotage in the port of Bristol there is still the obligation under the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 to have a compulsory pilot licensed by the corporation of Bristol when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port, although the vessel may be bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and may still be within one of those three pilotage districts which overlaps the port of Bristol. Consequently, when a vessel on her voyage puts into Newport, and then proceeds from Newport with a Newport pilot on board to the port of Bristol, as soon as the vessel gets within the limits of the port of Bristol the Newport pilot is bound to give up the charge of the vessel to a Bristol pilot demanding such charge, although the vessel is still within the Newport pilotage district, and within the district for which the Newport pilot is licensed.

CASE stated by justices of the peace in and for the city of Bristol.

At a petty sessions held in the city of Bristol on the 31st Jan. 1903 an information was preferred by John Reed (the appellant) under the statute 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii., s. 9, against Henry Goldsworthy (the respondent), for that the respondent on the 29th Jan. 1903, within the limits of the port of Bristol, unlawfully continued in charge of a certain steamship or vessel, called the Beacon Grange, not exempted from compulsory pilotage navigating within the port of Bristol, after a pilot licensed by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, namely, the appellant—had offered to take charge of the steamship or vessel, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided.

The information was heard and determined by the justices on the 19th Feb. 1903, when they dismissed the same.

By an Act of Parliament 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii. (the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807), being an Act for (amongst other things) "the better regulation of pilots and pilotage of vessels navigating the Bristol Channel," it was provided as follows:

Sect. 9. And be it further enacted that, from and after the first day of October next after the passing of this Act, all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island, except coasting vessels and Irish traders, shall be conducted, piloted, and navigated by pilots duly authorised and licensed by the mayor, burgesses, and commonalty of the said city of Bristol, by warrant under their corporate seal; and that the master, owner, or owners of every ship or vessel which shall be navigated in the limits aforesaid, without a pilot licensed as aforesaid, shall forfeit double the sum which would have been demandable for the pilotage of such ship or vessel, together with five pounds for every fifty tons burthen of such ship or vessel.

Sect. 11. And be it further enacted, that no person shall take charge of any vessel or in any manner act as a pilot, or receive any compensation for acting as a pilot within the limits aforesaid, unless authorised by licence under the seal of the said mayor, burgesses, and commonalty (which licence it is hereby declared shall express the name of the pilot so acting and the district aforesaid); and no such pilot shall act without having his licence at the time of his so acting in his personal custody, ready to be produced, which shall actually be produced to any person who shall lawfully require to see the same, or shall act in the British seas out of the limits expressed in his licence, on pain of forfeiting a sum not exceeding ten pounds, for the first offence, and for any second or subsequent offence any sum not exceeding twenty pounds.

Sect. 14. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for any licensed pilot to supersede any person not licensed as a pilot in charge of any ship or vessel within the limits aforesaid; and every master who shall within the limits aforesaid continue any person not licensed as hereinbefore mentioned after any pilot licensed as aforesaid to act within the said limits shall have offered to take charge of such ship or vessel, and every person assuming or continuing in the charge or conduct of any ship or vessel within the limits aforesaid, without being duly licensed as hereinbefore mentioned, after any other pilot licensed as aforesaid shall have offered to take charge thereof, shall respectively forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding ten pounds.

By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. cccxxvi.)—which was "an Act for establishing a separate system of pilotage for the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester in the Bristol Channel"—after reciting in the preamble the 9th section of 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii., and also reciting that "owing to the great extension of trade in the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester since the passing of the said Act it is expedient that a separate system of pilotage should be established in the Bristol Channel in connection with those respective ports, under the supervision of local boards for each of such ports," it was provided:

Sect. 4. From and after the first Wednesday in the month of January next after the passing of this Act, so much of the ninth section of the said Act of the second session of the forty-seventh year of King George the Third, chapter thirty-three, as relates to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

REED (app.) v. GOLDSWORTHY (resp.).

By sects. 5, 6, and 7 pilotage boards for Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester respectively were appointed.

Sect. 8. The district over which the Newport board shall have jurisdiction shall be that portion of the Bristol Channel which lies eastward of Lundy Island up to and including Kingroad, and the river Ussk as far as the Caerleon Bridge.

Sect. 23. Subject to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the board may from time to time license and appoint such number of proper persons to act as pilots within the pilotage district and to or from the port for which such board may have been appointed as they may think necessary, and may remove or suspend the licence of any such pilot at their pleasure, and may establish such rates and fees to be levied and paid for the risk, trouble, and labour of such pilots as to such board shall from time to time seem just and reasonable; and if any person shall pretend or hold himself out to be a licensed pilot, or in any manner act as a pilot without having been so licensed, or after his licence may have been revoked or suspended, he shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding fifty pounds.

Sect. 29. The master of every vessel bound from any of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester may, if he shall think it expedient so to do, require the assistance of any pilot licensed by the board for that port, and on being so required any pilot shall take on himself the charge of such vessel, and shall pilot the same for such distance within the pilotage district for which he may be licensed as the master of such vessel shall require, and any pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel to any such distance as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also, at the discretion of the board by whom he may have been licensed, be suspended or deprived of his licence.

Sect. 3 [the interpretation clause]. The word "pilot" shall mean any person licensed under this Act to act as a pilot for piloting vessels into or out of the port for which such licence has been granted.

By the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. clx)—an Act to confirm a provisional order made by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, relating to the pilotage district of Bristol—it was provided (in sect. 1) that the order set out in the schedule should be and the same was thereby confirmed. The order was an "order for exempting from compulsory pilotage, except within the port of Bristol, vessels bound to and from that port," and was called the Bristol Pilotage Order 1891.

Clause 3 of this order provided:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, the masters and owners of all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol shall be and they are by this order exempted from all obligation to be conducted, piloted, or navigated by pilots authorised or licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, except when within the limits of that port, which limits are as follows—namely, from the westwardmost part of the Flat and Steep Holms, up the course of the Bristol Channel eastward to Aust in the county of Gloucester, and from the said Holms southward athwart the channel to Uphill, and from thence along the coast eastward in the counties of Somerset and Gloucester to Aust aforesaid, and also from Holesmouth in Kingroad up the Avon to the city of Bristol, together with the several pills lying on the said river.

Clause 4. All existing by-laws, rules, and orders of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol relating to pilotage shall be read and have effect in accordance with the provisions of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807, as amended by this order.

The appellant was a pilot duly licensed by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol by warrant under their corporate seal, pursuant to the Act of the second session of 47 Geo. 3, c. xxiii., s. 9.

The respondent was a pilot duly licensed by the pilotage board for the port of Newport, pursuant to the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861.

On the 29th Jan. 1903, the steamship Beacon Grange was in course of a voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate via Newport and Avonmouth Dock, which is in the port of Bristol, and in the prosecution of her voyage the steamship entered the port of Newport for the purpose of taking in a portion of her cargo and coal for bunkering purposes, and was piloted into the Newport Dock by the respondent. Upon leaving Newport the steamship was piloted out of Newport Dock by the respondent, and proceeded on her voyage towards Avonmouth.

The appellant offered his services to pilot the vessel to Avonmouth Dock, which is in the port of Bristol, but his services were not accepted until Kingroad was reached, and with the permission of the master the appellant remained on board the steamship, and after entering the port of Bristol (but within that portion of the Bristol Channel which lies to the eastward of Lundy Island up to Kingroad) the appellant again offered his services with all proper formalities, and claimed to supersede the respondent. The respondent, however, claimed to pilot the steamship to Kingroad, and the master allowed him to do so.

Upon arriving at Kingroad, which is an anchorage immediately outside the mouth of the river Avon, the respondent gave up charge of the steamship, and the appellant took her into the Avonmouth Dock.

The steamship was not a coasting vessel or an Irish trader, and when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage.

On the part of the appellant it was contended: (1) That, inasmuch as the vessel had commenced a voyage under foreign articles from Liverpool to the River Plate and only touched at Newport in the performance of such voyage, she was not bound "from" Newport within the meaning of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861. (2) That the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 does not in any case contemplate a vessel as bound "from" Newport when she is proceeding from that port to Bristol. (3) That after entering the port of Bristol the steamship was then (even if not previously) a vessel bound for Bristol, and that the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 left all vessels bound for Bristol subject to the provisions of the Act 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxiii. (4) That the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 confirmed the rights of the appellant and other pilots licensed by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended: (1) That from and after the first Wednesday in the month of Jan. 1862, so much of sect. 9 of the Act 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxiii., as related to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, was repealed. (2) That the steamship came from Liverpool without any cargo to the port of Newport on the 25th Jan. 1903, for the purpose of taking in a portion of her cargo and coal for bunkering (that is, for her own steaming purposes), and left the port of Newport for Bristol on the 29th Jan. 1903, and was therefore a vessel bound "from" Newport within the provisions of sect. 29 of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, and might, if the master thought it expedient, be piloted within the district of the Newport Pilotage Board (which extends to Kingroad) by the respondent. That, the master having required the assistance of the respondent, the respondent was entitled to pilot the steamship up to Kingroad. (3) And, further, that if the respondent had refused to pilot the steamship he would have rendered himself liable to forfeit all his pilotage fee, and, at the discretion of the Newport Pilotage Board, might have been suspended, or deprived of his licence. (4) That the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1891 was merely an Act for exempting from compulsory pilotage, and did not repeal, and was not intended to repeal, sect. 4 of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861. (5) That the steamship was under the circumstances in question as much bound from Newport as she was bound for Bristol.

All the provisions of the Acts of Parliament and Pilotage Order, so far as applicable to the circumstances, were deemed part of this case.

The justices held that, upon the facts as found and stated in the case, the respondent had not, in point of law, committed an offence, and they therefore dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the justices came to a correct determination in point of law. If so, their determination was to stand; if otherwise, the case was to be remitted to the justices with the directions of the court thereon.

After the Act of 1807, already referred to, came the Bristol Dock Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. xliii.) which provided:

Sect. 66. The corporation [that is, the corporation of Bristol] may from time to time hereafter appoint and license any persons, duly qualified for that purpose, to be and officiate as pilots within the port of Bristol, and, at their discretion, suspend and discharge such persons from being pilots; and if any person, not being so appointed and licensed, shall take or hold the charge of or attempt to pilot any vessel within such port, unless such vessel be in distress, and there be no such pilot in sight, or shall otherwise act or attempt to act as such pilot within such port, and also if any person having the charge or pilotage of any vessel within such port, but not being such pilot, shall not, upon the approach of any such pilot, shorten sail for and take on board such pilot, and resign to him the charge or command of such vessel, every person shall for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding ten pounds.

Scrutton, K.C. (Clarell Salter with him) for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in refusing to convict the respondent. Sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807 requires that all vessels, except those which are there exempted, passing up or down the Bristol Channel shall be piloted by Bristol pilots duly licensed by the corporation; and sect. 66 of the Bristol Dock Act 1848 gives the corporation power to license duly qualified persons to act as pilots within the port of Bristol, and that section imposes a penalty upon any person, not being a duly licensed Bristol pilot, who takes charge of or pilots any vessel within the port of Bristol when there is a Bristol pilot available. So that under those Acts pilotage by a Bristol pilot was compulsory for all vessels (except exempt ships) passing up or down the Bristol Channel, eastward of Lundy Island. Then came the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, which in sect. 4 exempts from the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from one of the three ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and the only effect of that section is to cut out from the previous compulsion, vessels bound to or from these three ports. Then came the Pilotage Order, &c., Act 1891, which in clause 3 of the order extended the exemption still further, and provided that vessels passing up or down the Bristol Channel to or from the port of Bristol should be exempted from all obligation to be piloted by Bristol pilots, "except when within the limits of that port." This exception is important as showing that, although vessels are exempted from taking Bristol pilots on board when going to or from the port of Bristol, they are not so exempt when within the limits of the port of Bristol. The limits of the port of Bristol are there defined, and it is not disputed that this vessel was within the port of Bristol. Upon the construction of these statutes it is clear that sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 does not apply to this case, and there is no exemption in this case from the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807. The repeal of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 by sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 is a repeal only in so far as it relates to vessels bound to or from the three specified ports, and does not in the least affect vessels bound to or from the port of Bristol. Here the vessel was not bound "from" Newport within the meaning of sect. 4; she was bound—at all events after entering the port of Bristol—"for" Bristol. The Legislature, in passing the Act of 1861, had not in their minds at all the port of Bristol, and were dealing with the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester only, and that legislation leaves untouched the case of vessels going to or from the port of Bristol. Then the Act of 1891, while granting still further exemption from the obligation to have Bristol pilots on board under the Act of 1807, by exempting from that obligation vessels going to or from the port of Bristol, was careful to say "except when within the port of Bristol." The justices expressly find that this vessel when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage. Therefore this vessel was not a vessel bound "from" Newport within sect. 4, and, even if she were bound from Newport, at all events when she came within the port of Bristol she was bound to have a Bristol pilot. The decisions of the Court of Appeal in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49, affirming 72 L. T. Rep. 198) and of the Exchequer Chamber in General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) show that a compulsory pilot was necessary in this case as soon as the vessel entered the port of Bristol, and that that pilot must be one licensed by the corporation of Bristol.

dismissing the information. The Act of 1861 recites that owing to the great extension of trade in the ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester it was expedient to establish a separate system of pilotage for those ports, and the scheme of that Act was to create new pilotage areas or districts for those places. By sect. 4 of that Act the 9th section of the Act of 1807 is repealed as regards those vessels which were bound to or from those three ports. The vessel in the present case was at the time in question a vessel bound "from" Newport, and she was none the less bound from Newport because she happened to be going to Bristol. The object of sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 was to exempt a vessel from the obligation imposed by sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 to take a Bristol pilot on board when the vessel was bound to or from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester. The pilotage areas of some of these districts overlap, and that of Newport overlaps part of the port of Bristol. At the time when the respondent refused to give the charge of the vessel to the appellant, the vessel was still within the pilotage area or district of Newport, and therefore the Newport pilot was properly in charge as pilot. Sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 is important. This vessel was a vessel bound "from" Newport within the meaning of that section, and therefore the master could require—as he did—the assistance of a pilot licensed by the Newport Board, and, on being so required, the Newport pilot was bound to take upon himself the charge of the vessel, and to pilot the vessel for such distance within the pilotage district for which he might be licensed as the master of the vessel might require, and if the pilot refused to pilot the vessel to such distance, then he not only forfeited his right to any remuneration for his services, but he was also liable to be suspended or deprived of his licence. Therefore, in the first place, the provisions of sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 do not apply at all in this case by reason of the repealing provisions in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, inasmuch as this vessel was a vessel bound from Newport; and in the next place, even if the pilotage was compulsory within the port of Bristol, it would not be so for that part of the port of Bristol which was overlapped by the pilotage area of Newport, and by sect. 29 the Newport pilot (the respondent) was entitled to pilot the ship to the furthest limit of the district for which he was licensed, and he was therefore entitled to remain in charge of the vessel, even after the vessel had entered the port of Bristol, so long as she was still within the Newport pilotage district. The refusal by the respondent to give up the charge of the vessel to the appellant took place within the Newport pilotage district, although it may have been within the port of Bristol, and therefore no offence was committed. He referred to The Charlton (ubi sup.), The Rutland (76 L. T. Rep. 662; (1897) A. C. 333), and to the Act of 1891.

Clavell Salter in reply.—Taking these Bristol Acts together, they create the offence charged in this case, and that offence was committed unless the vessel was exempt under the Act of 1861. The effect of the Acts is that if a vessel is going into the port of Bristol and is in this area which is common to the port of Bristol and to the pilotage district of Newport, she is not exempt from compulsory pilotage simply because she happens to have been also at Newport.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case presents to me very considerable difficulties, and, but for the assistance that I have received from the arguments, I think I should like to have taken time to go through the statutes referred to; but, after the best consideration I can give to the case, I think that this appeal must be allowed. The general purview of these statutes may, in my opinion, be stated with fair accuracy and conciseness without going through the whole of their enactments in detail. Originally, as appears from the history in the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.), and as I should gather from the statutes themselves, Bristol was, practically speaking, the only port of importance upon the Bristol Channel for this purpose, and according to the earlier statutes—and for this purpose I need only commence with the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807—the authority for licensing pilots on the Bristol Channel was the Bristol Corporation. The respondent was summoned for an offence against the statute 47 Geo. 3, sess. 2, c. xxxiii. (the Bristol Wharfrage Act 1807), in that he had continued to navigate this vessel within the port of Bristol when a Bristol pilot had offered his services. Therefore it seems to me that what we have really got to consider is the true state of the law at present as regards the area over which pilotage is compulsory in and out of Bristol, and as regards the vessels in respect of which pilotage is compulsory in and out of Bristol. I may say at once that we ought to deal with this case upon the theory that this vessel was bound "from" Newport. Upon the facts in this case it is not, in my opinion, open to the appellant to say that this vessel was not treated by the magistrates, who decided in favour of the respondent, as being bound from the port of Newport; but, on the other hand, it must be observed that it is admitted that the pilotage was compulsory within the port of Bristol. A paragraph of the case says this: "The steamship was not a coasting vessel or an Irish trader, and when within the port of Bristol was not exempt from compulsory pilotage." Therefore we must take it that the ship in respect of which this right to be navigated in the port of Bristol by a Newport pilot is claimed can only succeed if she is able to establish that, under the sections to which I am about to refer, pilotage was not compulsory within the port of Bristol in respect of that area which was common to the port of Bristol and to the ports or pilotage districts of Cardiff, of Newport, or of Gloucester. I was for a considerable time very much impressed with the argument of counsel for the respondent. It seemed to me that it was open to grave consideration, apart from the language of the sections to which I am about to refer, that the scheme of the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861 was to create two or three other pilotage areas, the areas overlapping among themselves, as we are told that the pilotage areas of Newport and Cardiff do, and also overlapping that part of the Bristol Channel which is within the port of Bristol; and that it was intended to create certain authorities which should license pilots and should give to those pilots what I may call full rights within those geographical areas, even although the areas overlapped or were in certain parts in common. It seems to me that if we took that view, having regard to the fact that the pilotage was found to be compulsory in the

REED (app.) v. GOLDSWORTHY (resp.).

Bristol district, we should be obliged to come to the conclusion that the Newport pilot would be a good compulsory pilot and would protect the ship, even although the Newport pilot was within the port of Bristol and had not, of course, ex hypothesi been licensed by the corporation of Bristol. That being so, we have to consider whether that is the effect of the Act of 1861. It may be said, no doubt, that the Act of 1861 does recite that the great extension of trade in the several ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester made it expedient "that a separate system of pilotage should be established in the Bristol Channel in connection with those respective ports, under the supervision of local boards for each of such ports," and that, therefore, there is no doubt that certain privileges and rights in connection with pilotage and pilots were intended to be created by the Act of 1861. Then comes the section—namely, sect. 4—to which so much argument has been addressed, and with which we have to deal in this case: "From and after" a certain date "so much of the ninth section of the said Act"—that is, the Act of 47 Geo. 3, the Act of 1807—"as relates to vessels navigating or passing up or down the Bristol Channel, bound to or from either of the said ports of Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, shall be and the same is hereby repealed." I was for some time impressed with the view that that did mean to exempt from the provisions of sect. 9 of the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807 a vessel coming from Newport, Cardiff, or Gloucester, even though it went into Bristol, and that, at any rate within the area which was common to the two ports, or I should rather say to the port of Bristol and to the pilotage district of Newport—taking Newport in this case—created by sect. 8 of the Act of 1861, pilotage was no longer compulsory. It is to be observed that sect. 9 of the Act of 1807 says that "all vessels sailing, navigating, or passing up, down, or upon the Bristol Channel to the eastward of Lundy Island . . . shall be conducted, piloted, and navigated by pilots duly authorised and licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol"; and the subsequent section (sect. 11) prevents unauthorised persons—that is to say, persons not sanctioned and authorised and licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Bristol—from navigating these ships. It is with some doubt that I have come to the conclusion that it was not intended by the Legislature in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861 to include and deal with the case of vessels going into and out of the port of Bristol; that it was intended to deal with the case of vessels which were going to and from Cardiff, to and from Newport, and to and from Gloucester, by way of the Bristol Channel, and that the section did not purport to deal specifically with the case of vessels which were going into or out of Bristol at all. The concession was a very valuable one, as I pointed out in the course of the argument, because up to the passing of that Act in 1861, east of Lundy Island, all vessels, whether they went to Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, were bound to take Bristol pilots under the Bristol Wharfrage Act of 1807. The subsequent sections of the Act of 1861 also, I confess, for a time impressed me in the respondent's favour. The power to license in sect. 23, the compulsion in sect. 29 which compels a pilot to take a vessel to the limit of the district for which he is licensed, and the power in sect. 26 to license the old existing port pilots of Cardiff, Newport, and Gloucester for the whole pilotage area of the new pilotage authority certainly do tend in favour of the view put forward on behalf of the respondent, that these persons were intended to have licences to navigate ships throughout their whole pilotage area. I cannot, however, help thinking that this is all subject to the general observation that the Legislature, in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, were not thinking of or dealing with vessels that were going into or out of the port of Bristol at all. They were dealing with the case of the other ports there specified which were reached by the Bristol Channel; and therefore we must look at the other sections to see what are the provisions as to compulsory pilotage, and as to the persons who may be the compulsory pilots within the port of Bristol in the case of vessels going to and from the port of Bristol. In other words, to adopt the very comprehensive, accurate, and concise way in which counsel for the appellant put it in his reply, the effect of these statutes is not to exempt from compulsory pilotage vessels that are going into the port of Bristol, in this common area, simply because they happen to have been also at one of the ports which are mentioned in the Act of 1861. Therefore, though, as I have said, sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 and the other sections of that Act may afford arguments which have to be carefully considered, they are not, in my opinion, sufficient to support the argument of counsel for the respondent. I thought at first that possibly a distinction might be drawn between vessels bound from Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester, and vessels bound to those ports. For this purpose, I doubt whether that distinction is sound. I think sect. 29 was passed for the purpose of compelling the Cardiff, Newport, or Gloucester pilot to take the vessel as far as his district would allow him, otherwise he was to forfeit certain rights which he enjoyed under the Act. I am supported in that view by the curious enactment in sect. 3 of the provisional order of the Act of 1891. I quite agree, and I think it is fairly put by both of the learned counsel, that the real enacting effect of this provisional order, which has the force of a statute, was only to alter the old geographical areas to which the Act of 1807 did apply, and it is quite possible, and I think it is true, that the new geographical area was subject to all the enactments both in the Act of 1807 and in the amending Act of 1861, and any other statute which has been mentioned. But I think that the language of sect. 3 does confirm the view that in dealing with the Act of 1807 and the other legislation with respect to the Act of 1807, particularly that in sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, they were not dealing with the case of vessels going into and out of the port of Bristol, because the provisional order does appear to recognise that vessels going to or from the port of Bristol shall be exempted from all obligations except when within the limits of that port. I therefore come to the conclusion, on a consideration of the statutes themselves, that this vessel was not an exempt ship; that she was bound, within the port of Bristol, going to Bristol, when she got within the area of the port of Bristol, to have a compulsory pilot, and that the man who was navigating her—namely, the respondent—who might well think that under sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 he had the right to take her, was not the compulsory pilot contemplated by the earlier Act. Then it is said that the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.) is an authority in favour of this view. I do not think it is an authority at all. In my opinion the court were there dealing with a different case, and had not really before them the difficulties with which we have to deal in this case. I very much doubt whether the point which we have had to consider in this case was very carefully considered by the learned judges in that case. It is certain that they had not got all the statutes before them, and I doubt whether the point was carefully considered. But it is very obvious that in that case the only important question was, Was the duty of the compulsory pilot as such ended at the time of the collision, because, although he had been taken on board as a compulsory pilot, the vessel at the place where the collision occurred was outside the district for which the pilotage was compulsory, though still within the district for which the pilot was licensed? And unless the ship was an exempt ship outside Kingroad, or at any rate at the place where the collision occurred, no argument could have been raised. The case of General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) was referred to, and it was dealt with in the judgments in the case of The Charlton (ubi sup.), and, to put the matter shortly, as it was put by Kay, L.J. in The Charlton case, the pilot in that case came on board as a compulsory pilot, and he continued to be in the position of, though in fact he was not, a compulsory pilot at the time when the collision happened. There are certain expressions in those judgments which do support the view that their Lordships thought in that case that pilotage within the area of the port of Bristol was still compulsory. To that extent opinions were expressed in favour of the view which I have adopted after hearing the arguments for the appellant. But I do not want to base my judgment simply upon the authority of that case, because I do not think it is an authority in that sense. I come to the conclusion that the legislation upon which counsel for the respondent based his argument is not sufficient to exempt the ship, and does not remove the obligation to have a compulsory pilot on board when the vessel, bound to the port of Bristol, gets within the limits of that port; and in this case, inasmuch as the respondent, who was purporting to pilot the ship, was not licensed by the corporation of Bristol, but was only licensed to take vessels in and out of Newport, and, incidental thereto, to take them across this part of the area which was common to the various licensing districts when the vessel was leaving Newport, it does not enable the master to say that the statute was satisfied because he had got this pilot on board. I think, therefore, that the magistrates ought to have convicted in this case.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree, for the reasons given by my Lord.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and I only wish to add a very few words. One paragraph of this case states that this steamship, when within the port of Bristol, was not exempt from compulsory pilotage. If this is an area (the area ending with the point at Kingroad) within which she was not an exempt ship—in other words, within which she still had an obligation to take on board a compulsory pilot—then there was no power, as it seems to me, in the Newport pilotage authorities to create a compulsory pilotage for the Bristol port. The pilot who was on board was a pilot licensed by the Newport authorities; and, while under sect. 29 of the Act of 1861 he might be required to take an outward-bound vessel from Newport to the utmost limit within the Newport pilotage district that the master of the vessel wished, he could not thereby become a pilot who would be able to assert a right to be taken on board for the port of Bristol as a compulsory pilot. I am dealing with this case upon the basis of a statement in the case itself that this vessel was not an exempt ship from compulsory pilotage coming into Bristol, and, if that be so, then it seems to me, for the reasons which my Lord has given, that the Act of 1861 did not get rid of the obligation of compulsory pilotage, and that the post of a compulsory pilot could not be held by a pilot who had started as a Newport pilot and not as a pilot of the port of Bristol.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, Jan. 28.

LONDON TRANSPORT COMPANY LIMITED v. TRECHMANN BROTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Ship—Charter-party—Freight at per ton shipped payable on right delivery—Lump sum freight—Loss of part of cargo by jettison—Payment by consignees of bill of lading freight—Rights of charterers against shipowners.

By a charter party it was agreed that a ship was to load at Fiume a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and therewith proceed to Boston and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash; charterers' liability to cease when cargo was shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in the charter had been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight as presented, without prejudice or reference to the charter, any difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight to be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charterers had previously agreed with an American company at Boston to ship by the vessel named in the charter-party, a cargo of sugar in bags from Fiume to Boston at 10s. per ton.

On the vessel being loaded, the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—i.e., 6d. per ton—was paid, and bills of lading were signed.

In the course of the voyage the vessel went aground and part of the cargo was jettisoned. On the arrival of the vessel the remainder of the cargo was delivered, and the consignees thereupon paid to the shipowners the bill of lading freight payable on the gross weight shipped.

In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover so much of the freight paid by the consignees to the ship owners as represented the freight upon the cargo which was not delivered.

Held (by Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Collins, M.R., Romer, L.J. dissenting), that the charterers were entitled to recover the sum claimed.

Judgment of Walton, J. affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Walton, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the charterers of the steamship Wilster against the owners to recover a sum of 545l. 8s. 3d., part of the freight paid by the consignees of the cargo under the bill of lading, which the charterers claimed had been collected by the shipowners for the charterers' use.

On the 11th Dec. 1901 the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the American Sugar Refining Company of New York, by which they undertook to ship from 3000 to 3150 tons of sugar in bags, quantity at steamer's option, by the steamship Wilster, "Fiume to Boston, at 10s. per. ton of 1000 kilogrammes gross weight shipped."

On the 16th Jan. 1902 an agreement for the chartering of the steamship Wilster was entered into between the plaintiffs as charterers and the defendants as owners.

A printed form of charter-party was made use of, some of the printed words being struck out, and other words being written in. In the following copy of the material parts of the charter-party, the words within brackets are the printed words that were struck out, and the words that are in italics are those that were put in in writing.

London, 16th Jan. 1902.—It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Trechmann Brothers, of the good steamship called the Wilster of the measurement of 1332 tons, net reg., classed 100 A1. and 30 min. 3150 max. tons deadweight cargo capacity guaranteed now Fiume discharging . . . that the said steamer . . . shall . . . sail and proceed to Fiume . . . and there load . . . a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags [lawful merchandise] in the customary manner [including the usual deck cargo] which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, fuel, and furniture [but charterers having the full reach of the holds and spare bunkers, the same as if the steamer was loading for owner's benefit], and being so loaded shall therewith proceed immediately to Boston . . . and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading on being paid freight in full of all port charges, wharfages, consular, pilotages, and other charges customarily paid by steamers [for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold and every available space, the lump sum of or] at the rate of ten shillings and sixpence per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped [delivered], payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on London. [In the event of steamer not carrying the guaranteed dead weight as above, or owners failing to prove to the satisfaction of charterers that the steamer can carry same, owners to be responsible for the consequences thereof, and the above-mentioned lump sum to be reduced in proportion.] If required by master, one-third of freight payable here less 3 per cent. to cover interest and insurance. . . . The ship to be addressed at port of destination to charterers' agents on usual terms paying 2½ per cent. address commission on signing bills of lading. Charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in this charter have been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The master or person appointed by him shall sign bills of lading, at any rate of freight as presented without prejudice or reference to this charter; and, if required, he is to give charterers' agents in Fiume written authority to sign them for him in accordance with mate's receipts; any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel it required by master; if in charterers' favour by captain's draft payable three days after arrival at port of discharge, if in steamer's favour, in cash, less 3 per cent. for all charges. . . .

The bills of lading signed by the plaintiffs' agent contained the words "freight and other conditions as per agreement."

The agreement there referred to was the agreement of the 11th Dec. 1901 between the plaintiffs and the American Sugar Refining Company.

The vessel was loaded at Fiume with a cargo of 31,025 bags of sugar.

Bills of lading were signed, and the difference between the charter-party and the bills of lading freight—viz., 6d. per ton—was paid to the shipowners at or about the time when the vessel sailed from Fiume.

When close to Boston the vessel went aground, and there was very considerable difficulty in floating her.

Part of the cargo was jettisoned, and many of the bags of sugar were damaged by water, so that on the arrival of the ship at Boston only 27,743 bags out of the 31,025 that had been shipped were delivered to the consignees; and out of these 27,743 bags 7716 were empty.

The consignees of the sugar, the American Sugar Refining Company, paid to the defendants the whole of the bill of lading freight, that is to say, freight upon the whole cargo shipped at shipping weights, amounting to 1551l. 5s. 1d.

The plaintiffs alleged that under the charter-party they were not liable to pay full freight upon the whole cargo shipped at shipping weights, but were only liable to pay freight on the cargo actually delivered, and they brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum paid to the defendants by the consignees as freight in respect of the sugar which was not delivered, amounting to 545l. 8s. 3d.

At the trial of the action without a jury the following judgment was delivered:—

WALTON, J. (after stating the facts his Lordship continued:—) Now the question of the charterers' liability for freight must, of course, depend upon the terms of the charter-party. The shipowners say to the plaintiffs, the charterers: "We are entitled to the full freight which has been paid because we have just the same rights as you say you have under your bill of lading against the consignees." Under the charter-party the shipowners say: "We are entitled to recover the freight upon the total weight shipped, whether delivered or not, and therefore we are entitled to keep the 1551*l.* which we have in fact collected; it is not your freight, it is not a balance of freight over and above what we as shipowners are entitled to; we are entitled to the whole of it; we did not collect it for you the charterers." In support of that contention Mr. Carver referred to a number of cases, the last of which was the case of Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (29 L. T. Rep. 809; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99). The headnote in the Law Reports is this: "By charter-party a ship was to load at Colombo or Cochin from the charterers' agents a full and complete lading and proceed to London and discharge there, fire and other dangers of the sea excepted, a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House. Part of the cargo loaded in accordance with the charter-party was lost by fire without any default of the master or crew and the remainder was delivered in London. Held, that the shipowner was entitled under the charter-party to the full sum of 5000*l.*" In that case the freight was a lump sum of 5000*l.*, indivisible. The cargo was shipped and the whole of it was not delivered. Part of it was lost by fire, and it was there contended that the shipowner was not entitled to the lump sum of 5000*l.*, but only to some part of it. It was held that he was entitled to the full freight. Lord Bramwell, then Baron Bramwell, in giving judgment, said this: "The claim is 'a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House.' Now, Mr. Williams says that until the ship is discharged and there is a right delivery of the cargo the lump sum is not due. It may possibly be that verbally he is right. If so, what is the meaning of 'the cargo.' In my opinion it is the cargo which she has to deliver. It does not mean the cargo she has shipped but which she is not bound to deliver, which the shipowner is excused from delivering; it means the right delivery of the cargo which is to be delivered, not the right delivery of the cargo which was originally shipped on board of her. Now, there is a cogent argument in favour of this construction. Suppose that 5*l.* worth of these goods had been stolen by the crew, that would not be within the exceptions; then would it have been possible to have said that the whole lump sum was lost? Would not the common rule have applied? The defendants would have had to pay the freight and seek their remedy by a cross action. If that is so, is it not very odd that the shipowner is worse off, because he is not subject to an action than if he had been subject to an action—that is to say, he is worse off because fire has caused the loss than he would have been if it had been owing to a depredation of the crew? I venture to think some interpretation must be put upon the clause to preclude the entire delivery of the whole cargo being a condition precedent." Therefore in that case the court felt that it would be so unreasonable to say the shipowner must lose the whole of his lump sum freight if he failed to deliver any part, however small, of the cargo, that they were driven to put the construction upon the contract that the entire delivery of the whole cargo was not, and could not have been intended to be, a condition precedent. No doubt, then, if this charter-party were a charter-party for a lump sum freight as in that case I should be governed of course by that case, and I have no desire to distinguish it in any way, and should simply follow it. The question really is whether this charter-party is a charter-party similar to that which the court had to construe in the case of Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.). It seems to me that the reasoning upon which that judgment was arrived at depended essentially upon the fact that the freight payable was a lump sum freight in this strict sense, that it was an indivisible freight. I am not at all certain that if in that case the freight had been, not an indivisible lump sum, but a sum to be arrived at at a rate per ton upon the cargo shipped—and the delivery of the cargo intended to be carried and intended to be delivered under the bill of lading was prevented by some of the excepted perils—that the judgment would have been the same, I doubt whether in such a case as that, even though the freight was to be a freight payable upon the weight shipped, and in that sense perhaps a lump sum freight, it would have been regarded as an indivisible freight, and whether the court would have felt itself constrained, as it did in that case, to treat the words which correspond to the words of this charter-party, "payable on right and true delivery of the cargo" as something not amounting to a condition precedent. However, it is necessary to look at the clauses of this particular charter-party and see what is a fair construction of them with regard to the freight payable. I do not know that there are any clauses other than what I have read which really help in coming to a conclusion upon this matter. There is this clause which I have referred to which provides that: "Any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume on clearance of vessel, if required by master." That does seem to contemplate an adjustment at Fiume. It seems to contemplate that the freight payable under the charter-party is such a freight that at Fiume it would be possible to compare it with the bills of lading freight, and to settle once for all whether there is any difference either one way or the other, and if there is any difference it seems to contemplate that that difference should be paid at Fiume, whether it is in favour of the shipowners or the charterers. That, no doubt, as far as it goes, is rather in favour of the view put forward on behalf of shipowners by Mr. Carver, because if you cannot tell until the cargo is delivered in a case of this kind what the freight payable is going to be, and assuming the bill of lading bears the construction which is put upon it by the charterers, then it would be impossible to adjust the difference of freight at Fiume. I think to that extent, and to that extent only, does that clause throw any light on the matter. At the hearing I was rather inclined to think it might be carried further, but now I do not think it can. I think that the most that can be said about that clause is that it does appear to contemplate that any adjustment or difference of freight can be settled at Fiume. Of course it is to be observed that that clause is subject to this. The difference is to be settled at Fiume on the clearance of the vessel, "if required by master," and only if required by the master; so that it is not absolute, and one is really thrown back upon the very words of the clause which provided for the payment of freight. That clause provides that the vessel being loaded as required is to proceed to Boston "and there deliver the cargo agreeably to the bills of lading on being paid freight." I leave out some words, "at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange." The cargo as provided in the charter-party is a "cargo of sugar in bags," and I have looked through the bills of lading and I find mentioned in each bill of lading the number and the weight of the bags for which that bill of lading is given. I have gone through them, and I find that the weight per bag in all the bills of lading, although the quantities differ, is uniform. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, that in the ordinary course of things at Fiume, when a shipment is made of sugar in bags and bills of lading are given in the way they were given in this case, the weight of each bag is approximately ascertainable. It is taken to be a uniform weight, and according to these bills of lading it is 100·8 kilogrammes. In some of the documents it is treated as 100; but at any rate, whatever it may be, it is uniform. Therefore we have this. It is a shipment of sugar in bags, the weight of the bags being ascertained by the bills of lading. So that you have the shipping weight of the parcels which are shipped. That is certain. That being so, what is the meaning of the clause saying that the cargo is to be delivered "on payment of freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo." Does that mean that the freight is to be paid on the cargo which is rightly and truly delivered, or does it mean that freight is to be paid which shall be equal to 10s. 6d. per ton on the total weight shipped, and in that sense a lump sum not depending or referable in any way to the quantity of cargo delivered? I do not think that the cases which I have been referred to really help one very much. Those cases all proceed on the assumption, or rather upon the fact, that in those cases the freight was a lump sum freight. Is it a lump sum freight here? It is by reading the words as one must read words of the English language that one finds out the intention of the parties, unless there is some strict rule of construction which one must follow. Taking the words which make the cargo deliverable "on being paid freight at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped payable on right and true delivery of the cargo," and reading those words in their natural sense, I cannot help thinking that the only proper meaning which can be given to them is that freight is to be paid upon the cargo which is delivered. I do not find much difficulty with regard to the words "per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped."

I think they are quite satisfied and quite naturally interpreted as meaning that there is to be no dispute about weight. The weight is to be the weight as shipped. There is no need to alter the words at all, merely to interpret them, and it seems to me that, although no doubt it is expressed briefly and not quite fully, the meaning is that the freight is to be paid at shipping weights upon the cargo which is delivered. There might be a difference in the weighing of the bags at Boston and Fiume. The bags might have become wet and the sugar might have drained away and disputes might have arisen one way or the other. I think this charter-party fixes the weight per bag, and that weight is to be the shipping weight, and is to be ascertained and can be ascertained from the bills of lading. Therefore I think with regard to this point that the contention of the charterers must be accepted. Now, so far I have gone upon the mere language of the charter-party as it stands; but I think that to some extent I am confirmed in that view by noticing this. The charter-party is a printed form which has been adapted by certain alterations to the particular case, and I observe that the printed form itself is so framed that the form can be used, by striking out various passages, either for a lump sum freight or for a freight which is not a lump sum freight. That appears, for instance, in the sentence which fixes the freight. The printed form runs thus: "And there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight in full of all port charges, wharfages, consulage, pilotages, and other charges customarily paid by steamers for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold, and every available space, the lump sum of or at the rate of per ton of 20cwt. gross weight delivered, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo." So that the printed form may be adapted either to a lump sum freight, or to a freight which is at so much per ton on the cargo delivered, and here those parts of the form which are appropriated to a lump sum freight are struck out. For instance, the clause "but charterers having the full reach of the holds and spare bunkers, the same as if the steamer was loading for owner's benefit," is struck out. That is a clause which is put in to entitle a charterer, who pays a lump sum, to the full use of the ship, and is not appropriate in a case where a full cargo is to be shipped and to be paid for at so much per ton. Then in the clause which relates directly to the freight, the words "for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold and every available space, the lump sum of or" are struck out. So this printed form which can be adapted either to a lump sum charter-party or to a charter-party at so much per ton on the cargo delivered, is altered for the purposes of this case so as not to make it a lump sum charter, but a charter of a different kind. I do not say that is conclusive, because they might have made out a charter of a different kind, and yet such a charter that the freight would be payable on the whole quantity shipped, notwithstanding that some of it was lost, but it does point to this, that the parties did not intend it to be a lump-sum charter such as that which the court had to deal with in the case of The Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.). I only mention that as a matter confirming me in the view which I have arrived at on merely reading the words and giving them what I believe to be their natural and proper sense. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that this sum of 545l. 8s. 3d. is a freight which the shipowners are not entitled to keep. It was freight which was not payable by the charterers to the shipowners under the charter-party. If that is so I do not see how I can hold, having regard to the way in which business is done under a charter-party like this, that it was not collected by the shipowners from the charterers. It was collected under and upon the bills of lading from the holders of the bills. I am assuming that the consignees under the bills of lading were bound to pay it. I am not deciding that; I am expressing no opinion about it. They did, in fact, pay it, and it was a sum which, if I am right in my view of this charter-party, was not payable by the charterers, although it was receivable by the charterers under their bills of lading. Therefore, if I am right in my construction of the charter-party, and, indeed, whether the consignees were or were not strictly bound to pay it, I think that it was a sum received by the defendants under the bills of lading. It was paid on the bills of lading, and it is not chartered freight, which I think the shipowners are entitled to retain, and I think they have collected for, and must account for it, to the charterers. The consignees do not appear to have intervened in any way or to have attempted to get this money back, and as, in the present case, I am not dealing with their rights, I do not say whether they are entitled to get it back. Whether the consignees were bound to pay or not I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the money from the defendants. I ought to have said a word about the empty bags, because Mr. Carver said as to those empty bags, on 7716 at any rate, the freight was payable, because, even although the bag was empty you must take it as weighing the shipping weight. I appreciate what there is to be said in favour of that, but I think the freight was to be payable on the sugar in bags. No doubt the weight of the bag was to be included but where there was no sugar in the bags I do not think that any sugar was delivered, and therefore the freight is not payable on the empty bags.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C. (Leck with him) for the defendants.—This case turns on the question whether upon the true construction of the charter-party the freight payable is a lump sum freight, or whether it is to be paid upon the delivery of the cargo at the rate of the amount of sugar shipped. I submit that the freight is a lump sum freight, and if so the shipowners are entitled to retain all the freight which they collected from the consignees under the bills of lading. The charter-party freight is not payable with reference to the number of bags, but with reference to the number of tons shipped. The freight was therefore fixed as soon as the cargo was put on board, and it was in fact, according to the true construction of the charter-party, a lump sum freight. This view is supported by the provision that any difference between the chartered freight and the bills of lading freight was to be settled at Fiume. The governing case here is the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage, 29 L. T. Rep. 809; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99.

In that case Bramwell, B. said: "What is the meaning of 'the cargo'? In my opinion it is the cargo which she has to deliver. It does not mean the cargo she has shipped, but which she is not bound to deliver, which the shipowner is excused from delivering; it means the right delivery of the cargo which is to be delivered, not the right delivery of the cargo which was originally shipped on board of her." In that case the court approved of the decision in

The Norway, 13 L. T. Rep. 50; 3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 245;

He referred also to

Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company, 30 L. T. Rep. 28; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 74;

Hansen v. Harrold Brothers, 70 L. T. Rep. 475; (1894) 1 Q. B. 612.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and A. M. Talbot for the plaintiff.—The cases cited are cases of lump sum freight. But the question here is whether under this charter-party the freight is a lump sum freight. It is to be observed that the parts of the printed form which are specially applicable to a case of a lump sum freight have been struck out. Freight is prima facie a sum which is not earned until the cargo for which it is demanded has been delivered. That is well established:

Dakin v. Oxley, 10 L. T. Rep. 268; 15 C. B. N. S. 646.

That prima facie rule, that freight is only payable on delivery of the cargo, may be altered by the parties by some special agreement, but the burden of showing that the general rule is not applicable in any particular case lies on the person who contends that the rule does not apply. There are difficulties in the construction of this charter-party, but that is not enough to take the case out of the rule of Dakin v. Oxley. In the case of lump sum freight there is no relation between the freight paid and the nature of the cargo delivered. The clause here "at the rate of," &c., is irreconcilable with the freight being a lump sum freight. In the court below a case which turned on the words in a charter-party, "freight payable on deals and sawn lumber on the intake measure of quantity delivered," was cited for the defendants:

Spaight v. Farnworth, 42 L. T. Rep. 296; 5 Q. B. Div. 115.

But I submit that the decision of Bowen, J. is really in favour of the plaintiffs.

Carver, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is one, to my mind, of very great interest, and at the same time presents very great difficulty; but after the interesting and able arguments we have heard I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of my brother Walton is right. Now the terms of the contract must be carefully looked at, in order to ascertain what are the real rights of the parties in this case. I say, carefully looked at, because, it seems to me, that the real point in this case depends upon whether the contract in the case can be treated as a lump sum contract—that is to say, a contract for the use of the ship, and whether the argument as to a full cargo for a lump sum applies to this contract or not. Now, I think it is convenient that I should, in the first place, construe the contract and then see within which category it falls. It is a contract that the charterers are to load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags which the charterers bind themselves to ship, and the ship being so loaded shall proceed to Boston and there "deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading on being paid freight in full of all port charges"—so far it is a contract which contemplates the payment of the freight on delivery of the cargo—"at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on London." I pause there, for the purpose of pointing out that the words "deliver the cargo on being paid freight in full of all port charges," "at the rate of," and the words "payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash," all indicate an ordinary contract for payment of freight upon delivery of the cargo. The difficulty arises because after the words "at the rate of" you have "at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight shipped. Now, the real question we have to consider is this: Does the fact that the rate of freight is to be fixed solely with reference to the gross weight of the cargo shipped justify the defendants in turning this into, or in saying that this is, a contract which is subject to the incidents of a contract for a lump sum freight? It seems to me that there is another class of contract from which we must distinguish it, having regard to the principle we have to apply, before we can say it must be a lump sum contract, and that class of contract is one of which Spaight v. Farnworth (ubi sup.) is an instance, where the freight is said to be freight payable on delivery and freight payable on right and true delivery, but at a rate to be fixed according to the weight of cargo shipped. As in the timber case, there was a contract to pay freight on delivery at the rate of the weight or quantity of the timber shipped, so it seems to me quite possible that in a sugar case, as this is, you may have a contract to pay freight on delivery at the rate of the weight of cargo shipped, and the real difficulty in this case is within which class of contract this contract falls. Does it fall within the class of contract which is subject to the conditions which attach to a lump sum contract, or does it fall within that class of contract where the freight is payable upon delivery, but at a rate to be fixed on the weight shipped? The only two other clauses that have any bearing are these ordinary clauses: "Charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed, provided all the conditions called for in this charter have been fulfilled, but vessel to have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage." Then the other clause is: "Any difference between this charter-party and bills of lading freight shall be settled at Fiume," that is the port of loading. "on clearance of vessel if required by master; if in charterers' favour by captain's draft, payable three days after arrival at port of discharge, if in steamer's favour in cash, less 3 per cent. for all charges." At first I thought that was a very strong argument in favour of Mr. Carver's view, because it seemed to contemplate the ascertainment of the actual payment due from the one party to the other in respect of the cargo of the ship at the time that the vessel was loaded and left, but I think that I have attached too much importance to that, and for these reasons: It is quite plain that might apply to either class of contract, because it is merely for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the parties at the time, ex hypothesi there is a difference between the bill of lading freight and the charter-party freight, either in favour of one side or the other, which has to be adjusted, but when it has to be adjusted the only matter to be dealt with will be the balance between the two parties. The rest will remain at the same risk as before; in other words, the shipowner, though he has received the extra 6d., will still have to insure, and may be liable to lose his freight if he does not fulfil the conditions of the contract; and on the other side it is a clause which must be, or which may be, made use of in favour of the charterer, who will have got the bill of lading from the captain, and still the shipper will have to look for delivery of his cargo to get back that money, part of which he has already paid, and part of which he expects to repay himself when he has delivered the cargo. I therefore come to the conclusion, in accordance with the view of the learned judge, that it is open on this contract to say it is a contract whereby the cargo is to be delivered on being paid freight; or, in other words, the time of payment of freight is to be when the cargo is delivered, and it is to be paid on right and true delivery of the cargo at the rate of the sugar when it is put on board. I am fully alive to the difficulties in actually ascertaining what is to be paid when a cargo arrives short in quantity; but I cannot help thinking that these were the very difficulties which were pointed out by Bowen, J., and for the reasons which I will give in a moment, I do not think that the difficulty in the application of the contract justifies us in bringing it within the category of those contracts which are for lump sums. Now, why do I say that I think, at any rate in this court, we ought to hold that this language is not sufficient to turn this into or make it equivalent to a contract for a lump sum? I do not refer again to the provisions beyond saying that they are the ordinary provisions for payment on the chartering of a ship—freight to be payable upon delivery—except the one condition that it is at the rate of 10s. 6d. per ton gross weight shipped. Ever since Dakin v. Oxley (ubi sup.), which was decided in 1864, I think that it has been recognised that Willes, J. laid down the law absolutely correctly when he said that "The true test of the right to freight is the question whether the service in respect of which the freight was contracted to be paid has been substantially performed; and according to the law of England, as a rule, freight is earned by the carriage and arrival of the goods ready to be delivered to the merchant, though they be in a damaged state when they arrive. If the shipowner fails to carry the goods for the merchant to the destined port, the freight is not earned. If he carry part, but not the whole, no freight is payable in respect of the part not carried and freight is payable in respect of the part carried unless the charter-party make the carriage of the whole a condition precedent to the earning of any freight." Under what circumstances is that departed from? I believe it is accurate to state, as has been stated in the course of the arguments by both of the learned counsel, that, as far as authority goes, that rule has never been departed from, except in the case of lump freight, or, in other words, freight paid for the use of the ship, and which would be due however much cargo the charterers put on board the ship. It is quite true that in the Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.) you have the same words: "A lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of cargo," and it was held that that 5000*l.* was due because it was a lump sum, and that the right delivery of the whole cargo could not defeat or could not prevent the shipowner being entitled to receive that lump sum. That was following the cases of The Norway (ubi sup.) and Knights v. Robinson (ubi sup.), and therefore if, as I have said, the only reasonable construction to put on this charter-party is that it is to be a charter-party for a lump sum, which lump sum is to be ascertained by paying 10*s.* 6*d.* per ton upon every ton shipped—if that is the true construction of this charter-party, of course the principle of the Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage (ubi sup.) would apply. But I think it does require special words in order to deprive the word "freight" of the meaning which has been attached to it by the law of England for so many years, and I think that the mere fact that there would be difficulties in ascertaining what is due, because when the cargo arrives it has to be measured by the weight at shipment, is not sufficient, but only brings the case within that category of contract where freight in the ordinary sense of the word has to be measured, not by the weight of the goods when they arrive, but by the weight of the goods when they are shipped. I fully recognise the difficulties there are in working out the contract, but those are difficulties in application, and must not be allowed to prevent us applying the rules of law; and I think, although the case does present very considerable difficulties, this contract is in its terms an ordinary contract for payment of freight at a rate to be so ascertained, and is not a contract which has the incidents of a lump sum freight. For that reason I think my brother Walton has come to the right conclusion on the construction of the contract. With regard to the other point, in my opinion it does not arise, because I think the charterers were, on the construction I put upon the charter-party, only liable to pay to the shipowner the rate of freight which Walton, J. has assessed. If the case could be argued on the basis that the other sum of money, the larger sum of money, was not due from the consignees to the charterers, different considerations might have arisen; but it seems to me, to the extent to which they received the money beyond that which was due from the charterers to them, they certainly did receive it by virtue of their position under the charter-party and as agents for the charterers. I therefore think this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add, because I not only agree with the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, but also with that of Walton, J. It seems to me that the basis of the whole question here is, what is the right of the shipowner to freight? It is perfectly clear law that prima facie freight is not payable except upon delivery of the cargo. You have to find some special provisions sufficiently clearly expressed in the contract between the parties to oust that prima facie presumption. Therefore, in approaching this case, you must start with supposing that where freight is stipulated for, it is a condition precedent to the earning of that freight that the goods should be carried to their destination. Now, what do I find here on the face of this charter-party? To begin with, it is not a contract written out de novo between the parties, but it is a contract based upon a printed form, some parts of which are allowed to stand, and some parts of which are excluded, and on the face of this printed form there is a provision for agreeing distinctly for what is called a lump sum freight and there is also a provision for the ordinary agreement of ordinary freight, i.e., freight to the earning of which delivery is a condition precedent. The contract is to load a full and complete cargo and deliver it at a certain place agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight in full, and then, "At the rate of 10*s.* 6*d.* per ton of 20*cwt.* gross weight shipped, payable on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash, at the current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on London?" Is there anything in those terms incompatible with the prima facie obligation to deliver the cargo before you can earn your freight? The only thing that can be suggested as incompatible with it is that the rate at which the freight is to be paid is the rate per ton of the gross weight shipped. What is there inconsistent with that in the obligation to deliver the cargo before you have earned your freight? It seems to me nothing. It is a convenient way of measuring that which is to be paid for—the freight—and it is convenient in this way, that for many causes the weight may be altered during the course of transit without any fault on the part of the shipowners, and therefore it is thought a fair provision that they should have a perfectly indisputable weight, the weight when the cargo is shipped, as the basis on which the freight was to be paid; and if it should happen that that weight is diminished by causes outside the shipowners' responsibility, they are not to suffer in that respect, but are to be paid on the weight of the cargo shipped, not on the weight of the cargo delivered, which may be less. That is a very intelligible provision, and one which the parties might perfectly well have in mind when they made the stipulation, without any intention whatever to qualify the always underlying obligation to deliver your cargo before you earn your freight. Now, that being what I should myself treat as the prima facie inference from the word "freight," I find that it is considerably strengthened in the particular circumstances of this case. In the printed form used for this charter-party I find after the provision for the delivery of the cargo on payment of freight, a clause "for the full reaches and burden of the steamer's hold, and every available space, the lump sum of." That provision, which would have supported the contention of the shipowners that the contract was for a lump sum freight, was scratched out, and what is left in is the clause beginning "at the rate of," which is the other and alternative form, which indicates freight in the ordinary way. So it is not merely a case, as I have said already, of writing out the contract as if was written out on a new sheet of paper; but it was a deliberate deletion of that part of the printed contract which would have formed the obligation which the shipowner now sets up as the one between him and the charterer. The Lord Chief Justice has gone through the rest of the charter-party and referred to the leading authorities on the matter, and I not think it is necessary to repeat anything that he has said. I agree in all he has said as to the right of the charterer to recover back from the shipowner the surplus which he has received over and above the freight to which he alone has any right—namely, the freight payable on the cargo actually delivered. I agree therefore with the learned judge, and I think that this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I am extremely sorry that I feel obliged to form an opinion which differs from that of my Lords and from that of Walton, J. Inasmuch as the question involved in this appeal is one concerning charter-parties, I need scarcely say that I differ with the greatest diffidence, for I have no doubt that in all human probability my opinion is wrong. At the same time, I have formed that opinion, and my duty is, sitting here, when I have formed an opinion to express it. I have come to the conclusion, stating the matter somewhat briefly, that the case before us cannot be distinguished in principle from that which was decided in the case of Merchant Shipping Company Limited v. Armitage (ubi sup.), and the cases there cited. To my mind, when this charter-party is looked at it will be found in effect that the cargo which is the subject of it is treated as one cargo, not as something broken up into portions, and that in substance the amount that is to be payable for freight is in effect a lump sum though it is not called so. The cargo which is to be loaded under this charter-party, is a full and complete cargo; and the tonnage of the ship and its carrying capacity is stated. That cargo, of course, might vary by a few tons either way, according to the minimum or maximum capacity of the ship, but it was to be a full and complete cargo; and then you find that the freight was to be estimated with regard to that cargo at so much per ton. That appears to me to have been a short way of arriving at the amount of the freight directly the cargo was shipped and the ship was ready to depart. The method of ascertaining the sum that had to be paid for freight was, of course, fixed by reference to tonnage, because, as I have pointed out, the exact amount of the tonnage contained in the full and complete cargo could not be ascertained until the whole cargo was on board. Then when I come to the part of the charter-party which states as to when the freight is payable, how do I find the question of payment is dealt with with reference to the cargo? Is it dealt with with reference to tonnage, or anything of that sort; or is it dealt with with reference to the cargo as a whole? It is clearly dealt with with reference to the cargo as a whole. It is payable on the right and true delivery of the cargo in cash. Then it is stated that in substance this is to be treated as a provision for payment of the freight according to the tonnage of the cargo, or according to the bags in which that cargo was packed at the moment of delivery, so that you can only ascertain the freightage payable by seeing what tonnage is delivered or how many bags are handed over. Now let me first consider the question of tonnage. Is it a natural inference or a proper inference from this charter-party that it was contemplated that the freight would be payable according to the tonnage of the goods as delivered? In what shape was this sugar to be shipped? On the face of the charter-party, it was to be shipped in bags. Those bags, on the face of the charter-party, might be of any size; they might be of any weight. I find, nevertheless, that the freight is to be ascertained with reference to the gross weight of the cargo shipped, which would include the weight of the bags. You could not ascertain, then, with regard to this cargo, except by weighing it as a whole, what portion of it would be delivered on arrival of the ship, if any portion of it was lost. If the freight was payable according to tonnage on delivery (which is one of the views put forward by the respondents on this appeal) let me see what would have to be done. Could it be contemplated by this charter-party that there would have to be a re-weighing of the cargo on delivery? How could you properly re-weigh it if the whole cargo did not arrive—properly weigh it when it has been delivered in such bags as I have indicated? You could not possibly do it, nor do I think it could have been contemplated that the weight on arrival was supposed to be a matter on which the payment of freight depended; and, when you bear in mind that sugar must of necessity change in weight, it seems to me almost inconceivable that they could have supposed that the amount of freight payable on this charter-party had to be considered with reference to the weight of the sugar on arrival, especially, as I have said, when you bear in mind that it would be impossible to tell from the cargo, when it arrived, if the whole did not arrive, how much had been wasted, or what was the tonnage of the cargo that arrived when it was shipped. Of course, if I had come to a conclusion in other respects as to the true meaning of this charter-party, and thought that it did not come within the principle laid down in Merchant Shipping Company Limited v. Armitage (ubi sup.), I should not be deterred by difficulties of that sort from trying to do what was right between the parties, but I do point out the difficulties as showing that it could not have been contemplated in this case, as it appears to me, that there should have been any sort of re-assessment of this cargo with reference to tonnage in order to ascertain the freight which is payable. Then I come to the next suggestion, which, I think, really was the main suggestion of the respondents on this appeal, namely, that a charter-party has to be construed as if it were a provision for payment of freight according to delivery of the bags in which the sugar was. I have already pointed out that there is nothing in this charter-party which says anything about the size or weight of the bags, and, except in saying that the cargo is to come in bags, there is nothing in this charter-party to show that the bags had anything whatever to do with the freight, and if it had been contemplated that the payment of the freight would have depended on the number of bags that arrived more or less filled with sugar, nothing could have been more easy than to have said so in this charter-party. If the freight was to depend upon the number of bags which were delivered it appears to me difficult to see why the charter-party, in dealing with the question of freight, referred at all to the gross weight of the cargo as it was shipped. It appears to me, therefore, that to hold that this charter-party means that the freight is payable only on the cargo in bags as per bag when delivered, is to do violence to this charter-party, and to put upon it a construction which it really will not bear. Then I may point, as supporting the view that I am taking, to one of the later clauses in this charter-party. I refer to the clause about what is to happen when the master signs the bill of lading, and the rate of freight in the bills of lading differs from that in the charter-party. That provision, to my mind, points to this: that it is contemplated that the freight which is payable under this charter-party is a sum then ascertainable and which can be finally adjusted, if there is a difference between the bill of lading and the charter-party, by a sum in cash then ascertainable. It appears to me, therefore, that this charter-party, when looked at as a whole, is, in substance, a charter-party for a cargo as a whole, not split up into items which can be separately identified, and in respect of which you can fairly put on them a separate rate of freight. It is, therefore, as I have said, as it appears to me, within the principle of the cases I have referred to. Now, I will only say with reference to Spaight v. Farnworth (ubi sup.) that that really is no authority whatever in the present case, nor has it, to my mind, any material bearing upon it. There there was no question of the construction of a charter-party. There it was admitted that the freight was payable according to the timber delivered, and the only question was with reference to a provision as to the measurement of the timber, with reference to the kind of measurement adopted at the port of shipment. If that case is looked at, as I have said, it is no authority at all on the present question. Given the respondents in this case were right in the construction of the charter-party, I should not hesitate to carry out that construction merely because it occasioned difficulties, but I do think, apart from all other considerations, the construction contended for by the respondents in this case does lead to almost incredible results—at any rate, to me, incredible. It would really appear from their contention, if they are right as to the bags, that in a case of jettison, if the parties had only jettisoned portions of the sugar—three parts of the sugar out of every bag—they would be able to say that the whole freight was payable, but that if they jettisoned the whole of the sugar out of a certain number of bags, then they could be entitled to say the freight was only payable in respect of the remaining bags which contained the sugar. At any rate, that does not seem to be a result that could be desirable, nor does it appear to me to be a result which ought to follow from the charter-party. I have expressed my opinion, as I have said, and I do so with very considerable diffidence.

Carver, K.C.—Your Lordship has not dealt with the point of the 7716 bags which were empty. The learned judge has taken the bags delivered as that on which the freight has to be paid. I have submitted, but your Lordships have not dealt with the matter, that the freight ought to be paid on those as well as on the others.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—A point arises, as I understand it, on this passage at the end of the judgment of Walton, J.: "I ought to have said a word about the empty bags, because Mr. Carver said as to those empty bags, on 7716 at any rate, the freight was payable, because even although the bag was empty you must take it as weighing the shipping weight. I appreciate what there is to be said in favour of that, but I think the freight was to be payable on the sugar in bags. No doubt the weight of the bag was to be included, but where there was no sugar in the bags I do not think that any sugar was delivered, and therefore the freight is not payable on the empty bags." Your claim is in respect of the bags being taken to be empty for this purpose?

Carver, K.C.—Yes.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Hamilton, I am sorry I did not notice the point yesterday; I ought to have done so, especially after it was clearly mentioned by Mr. Carver. We must take it for this purpose that the bags were empty. On the view that the Master of the Rolls and I take of this agreement, confirming Walton, J., Walton, J. had to find how much sugar in bags was delivered at the weight which that sugar in bags was shipped; and he has gone through some calculation and arrived at that. It is said that ought to be increased, because in addition to what he has found for that, 7716 empty bags were also delivered. I think that was not sugar in bags, and, therefore, on the principle on which we have decided this case, whether we are right or wrong, Walton, J. was right in excluding those.

Carver, K.C.—Might I state that the learned judge did not make any calculation?

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We have had no argument on the question whether he arrived at the right figure or not. We are here to discuss the important question of law.

LUMBY v. FAUPEL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant to pay all assessments "which now are or during the term shall be imposed or assessed"—Paving expenses under Public Health Act 1875—Works completed before lease—Apportionment after lease—liability of lessee.

A covenant by a lessee that he will pay "all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever which now are or during the said term shall be imposed or assessed upon the said premises or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise" does not apply to paving expenses which have become a charge upon the premises under the Public Health Act 1875 upon the completion of the works before the date of the lease, although such expenses do not become payable until after that date.

Surtees v. Woodhouse (88 L. T. Rep. 407; (1903) 1 K. B. 396) followed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversing the decision of the judge of the Kingston-on-Thames County Court.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 25l. 18s. 11d. which the plaintiff had been compelled to pay to the Wimbledon Urban District Council, being the proportionate amount of the paving expenses incurred by the council in carrying out certain improvements under sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, apportioned in respect of certain premises belonging to the plaintiff, situate in Broadway, Wimbledon.

On the 7th Oct. 1879 the plaintiff had demised the premises in question to one Gordon.

On the 4th May 1893 Gordon assigned to the defendant.

On the 2nd Nov. 1899 the defendant surrendered the lease to the plaintiff, the deed of surrender containing an absolute release and discharge of the defendant by the plaintiff from all rents and covenants and conditions reserved by and contained in the indenture of lease of the 7th Oct. 1879, and from all actions, proceedings, claims, and demands in respect thereof.

On the same day—viz., 2nd Nov. 1899—the plaintiff granted to the defendant a new lease of the same premises for a term which was to commence on the preceding 29th Sept.

The new lease contained the following covenant:

That the lessee will pay the rent hereby reserved at the time and in manner aforesaid, and will pay all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever which now are or during the said term shall be imposed or assessed upon the said premises or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise.

Before the execution of this lease—i.e., in Jan. 1898—the Wimbledon Urban District Council had finally completed the improvements under sect. 150 of the Public Health Act, but the expenses of the works were not apportioned under that section among the frontagers till Dec. 1900.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 257. Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act . . . such expenses may be recovered . . . from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred.

The County Court judge held that under the above-mentioned covenant, in the lease of the 2nd Nov. 1899 the defendant was bound to repay to the plaintiff the amount which the plaintiff had been compelled to pay to the Wimbledon Urban District Council.

The Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversed the decision of the County Court judge upon the ground that the words in the covenant, "rates, taxes, and assessments," were not wide enough to cover the apportioned expenses of paving a street under sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, and they therefore gave judgment for the defendant.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 562.

The plaintiff appealed.

W. O. Hodges for the plaintiff. (a)—The defendant's covenant is that he will pay all assessments which now are "or during the said term shall be" imposed or assessed. The charge on the property may have existed before the execution of the lease to the defendant, but the assessment was not made till after the date of the lease. Reliance is placed by the defendant on a recent decision of the Court of Appeal:

Surtees v. Woodhouse, 88 L. T. Rep. 407; (1903) 1 K. B. 396.

But in that case the important words of the covenant were, as Stirling, L.J. observed near the end of his judgment, "outgoings charged," not "outgoings payable." There the defendant was not liable, because the charge on the land was not made during the term. The defendant's covenant also contains the words "which now are" imposed or assessed. That means which have been imposed or assessed before the commencement of the term. The lease was intended to be retrospective. The term was to begin before the date of the indenture.

Dankwerts, K.C. and S. Green for the defendant.—Under sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 the charge was imposed on the premises on the completion of the works, and therefore the defendant is not liable under his covenant to reimburse the plaintiff. The point is settled by Surtees v. Woodhouse (ubi sup.), which followed Stock v. Meakin (82 L. T. Rep. 248; (1900) 1 Ch. 683). The liability is created by the charge. The subsequent assessment is merely a matter of calculation as to the exact figures. The duty of paying is on the landlord, and if he does his duty there would be no charge or assessment, and he clearly could not recover anything from his tenant. It is only when the landlord makes default that the local authority steps in, does the work, and assesses on the frontagers the proportions of the expenses they must pay. A landlord cannot, by making default in his duty, bring his case within the words of such a covenant as this, so as to impose a liability on his tenant.

Hodges in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I decide the case, not on the point that has been mainly argued, but upon the last point, which is a very short one, and upon which it appears to me the authorities are conclusive. The headnote to Surtees v. Woodhouse (ubi sup.) in the Law Reports is this: "Where by a covenant in a lease the lessee covenanted that he would during the term pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof: Held, that the covenant did not apply to expenses of private street works, which under the Private Street Works Act 1892 had become a charge upon the premises on the completion of the works before the date of the commencement of the term

(a) So much of the argument as had reference to the point upon which the decision of the Divisional Court was based is not here set out, because that point is not considered in the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

granted by the lease, though not payable until after that date." Now, in the present case paying expenses had been incurred in respect of these premises before the date of lease to the defendant, and though the amount payable in respect of them had not been assessed at the date of the lease, still the charge, according to this authority, had become a charge upon the premises—i.e., the liability had been incurred. The defendant had surrendered the lease, which he had held at the time when these expenses became a charge on the premises, and he had received a complete release from all his obligations towards the lessor in respect of these premises. After that he took the existing lease, and the covenant that we have to construe appears to me for all purposes of this discussion to be on all fours and identical with the covenant in Surtees v. Woodhouse. The covenant here is this "And the lessee hereby covenants with the lessor in manner following—that is to say, that the lessee will pay the rent, hereby reserved at the time and in manner aforesaid, and will also pay all rates, taxes and assessments whatsoever, which now are, or during the said term shall be imposed or assessed upon the said premises, or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise." It seems to me that that covenant is identical for all purposes of this discussion with the covenant in Surtees v. Woodhouse, and, just as there, it was held that the fact that the expenses had ripened into a charge before the commencement of the new lease was a complete answer to any claim made upon the new lease, so, it seems to me, it is a complete answer here. I have listened to the argument of Mr. Hodges, and I am really unable to follow the distinctions which he seeks to make between the obligations arising on the two covenants, and, therefore, I do not propose to attempt to go through them. It appears to me that the grounds of the decision of Surtees v. Woodhouse apply just as much whether the words are "outgoings," or whether, as they are here, "assessments," because the basis of the decision was that the charge had accrued before the assessment was made, and the fact that the charge subsisted was not affected, nor was any fresh liability imposed by virtue of the fact that assessment came after. The charge was for an amount which was afterwards assessed and although the assessment did not take place until after the currency of the new lease, nevertheless it gave no new right at all in respect of a right which had accrued, and which in this case was satisfied before the new lease arose. In Surtees v. Woodhouse (ubi sup.) Williams, L.J. after reading from the words of the covenant in question, said: "In my judgment these words would not cover a rate or charge which had become effective before the date of the lease, by reason merely of the completion of the works," and then, lower down, he said: "Apart from the words 'present and future' the covenant is to my mind perfectly plain, and does not impose upon the tenant the obligation to pay charges to which the property had been assessed for private street works, but which had not become payable. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of Walton, J. must be reversed." And Stirling, L.J. said in a written judgment, after referring to sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875: "It appears to me that, by the combined effect of this last section and sect. 112 of the Private Street Works Act 1892, the apportioned amount became charged on the owner at the time of completion of the works as from that date." That is to say, although the apportionment did not take place till afterwards, nevertheless the apportioned amount had become charged. My brother Mathew gave judgment to the same effect. For these reasons I think that on this point this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons as those given by my Lord.

GRIFFIN v. HOULDER LINE LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—"Factory"—Ship in a dock—"Workman"—Seaman—Factory and Workshop Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22), s. 104—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A ship moored to buoys in a dock preparatory to proceeding to sea occupies part of a factory within sect. 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901.

An able seaman employed in the ordinary duties of a seaman on such a ship is a "workman" within sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and, subject to the provisions of that Act, is entitled to be compensated by the ship-owners for personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of such employment.

So held by Collins, M.R. and Cozens-Hardy, L.J., Mathew, L.J. dissenting.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the decision of the judge of the City of London Court that she was not entitled, under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, to any compensation for the death of her husband, who had been killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants.

The agreed facts of the case were as follows:—

The applicant, Elizabeth Ann Griffin, is the widow and administratrix of Edward Latimer Griffin, deceased.

The deceased was an able seaman, and on the 21st Nov. 1902 he signed articles at Liverpool to serve on board the respondents' steamship Royston Grange as an able seaman, upon a voyage from Liverpool, where the ship was then lying, to the River Plate and back to this country.

The deceased duly joined the ship pursuant to the articles on or about the 22nd Nov. 1902, and sailed in her from Liverpool to Newport, Monmouthshire, at which port the vessel called to take in her bunker coal for the voyage.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vessel arrived in the Alexandra Dock, Newport, on the 24th Nov. 1902, and at midnight on the 28th Nov. she had finished receiving her bunker coals, and was moved out to the buoys in the dock preparatory to proceeding to sea on the following morning.

Whilst engaged clearing up the No. 5 hold on the 29th Nov. 1902 a dunnage wood, known as a "tom," and used for the purpose of supporting a deck beam when heavy weights were stowed above, was knocked down by a fellow servant of the deceased, and fell across his ankle and instep, which necessitated an operation. The accident and the operation resulted in the death of the deceased.

At the hearing before the judge of the City of London Court the judge held that the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 was not intended to include the case of a sailor working as a sailor, and as the deceased was working as a sailor, and nothing else, at the time when the accident happened, his case was not within the Act, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to any compensation under the Act.

Jan. 12.—Robson, K.C. and G. A. Scott for the plaintiff.—The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 does not apply to defined classes of workmen, but to employments in certain specified places. The first question here, therefore, putting aside for the moment the nature of the employment of the deceased, is whether or not the place in which he was employed at the moment when he met with the accident, was a "factory" within the Act. He was in a ship which was in a dock, and it must now be taken to be well settled law that a ship in a dock is a "factory" within sect. 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22) and is therefore also within sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897:

Raine v. Jobson and Co., 85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404;

Bartell v. Gray, 85 L. T. Rep. 658; (1902) 1 K. B. 225.

It is true that here the vessel was moored to a buoy and not occupying a berth at the side of the dock, but that can not make any real difference between this case and the three just cited. It is enough that she was lying in a dock and was therefore in a "factory." The defendants are the "undertakers" of the factory:

Merrill v. Wilson, 83 L. T. Rep. 490; (1901) 1 K. B. 35.

The only real question in this case is whether the deceased, although employed in a factory, is deprived of the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 by reason of the fact that he was employed as a seaman. Seamen are not expressly excluded from the benefits of the Act, as they are from the benefits of the Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42) in consequence of the saving clause, sect. 13, of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (33 & 39 Vict. c. 90). A stevedore's labourer would be entitled to compensation if he met with the same accident that the deceased met with, and there is no reason why the plaintiff here should not be entitled to compensation. The remarks of the Lord Chancellor Raine v. Jobson and Co. (ubi sup.) as to the exclusion of seamen from the Act only had reference to accidents taking place on a ship when at sea.

Carver, K.C. and Dawson Miller for the defendants.—The deceased was engaged at the time of the accident in ordinary seaman's work, unconnected with loading or unloading. That was not the class of work contemplated by the Act. His employment was not connected with a "factory." The ship was not in the dock for the purpose of work connected with the dock. She was in transit from her berth to the open sea. She was merely passing through the dock. She was not in occupation of any definite part of the dock. The kind of occupation necessary to satisfy the Act is an occupation of a place for the purpose of doing work there:

Wrigley v. Whittaker, 86 L. T. Rep. 775; (1903) A. C. 299.

In that case the House of Lords approved the decision of the Court of Appeal in Francis v. Turner Brothers, 81 L. T. Rep. 770; (1900) 1 Q. B. 478.

Robson, K.C., in reply.—The two cases just cited were decided on sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and it was held that "employment in a factory" meant employment by the undertakers in their own factory. Those cases refer to the "use" of a factory and have nothing to do with the present case, which depends on sect. 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—COLLINS, M.R. read the following judgment: I agree with the judgment about to be read with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., but, as there is a difference of opinion among us, I will state my opinion in my own words. The question is whether a sailor who met with an accident while engaged in clearing out the hold preparatory to receiving cargo in a ship which was lying at anchor in a dock can take proceedings against the owners of the ship under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The County Court judge has decided that he cannot, on the broad ground that the Act does not apply to sailors. It is not contended that there is any provision expressly excluding sailors from the Act. The question, therefore, must be, Do they come within the class of persons to whom the Act gives a remedy? Sect. 1 of the Act provides as follows: "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act." Therefore the applicant must be a workman, and the employment must be one to which the Act applies. By sect. 7, sub-sect. 2, "workman" is defined as including "every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise, and is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing." By sub-sect. 1 of sect. 7 "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a . . . factory." And by sub-sect. 3 "undertaker" in the case of a factory means the occupier thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act; and by the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, s. 104, "the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock . . . or of any premises within the same or forming part thereof . . . shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory." It was once thought that, as the Act does not in terms constitute a ship a factory, employment in a ship in a dock was not employment in a factory, and the inference was also drawn that, as ships were not made factories, the Act was not intended to include sailors. The House of Lords, however, held in Raine v. Jobson (ubi sup.) that a workman employed in a ship which was in a dock was employed in a factory. The fact that he was employed in a ship did not negative his being employed in a factory. Therefore, if the exclusion of sailors from the Act is rested on the fact that employment in a ship cannot be employment in a factory, the foundation for such contention is destroyed by that case. This court has applied the principle of Raine v. Jobson to more than one case where workmen sent by their employers to do painter's or joiner's work in a ship in a dock have been held to be within the Act and to be entitled to compensation against their employers as the undertakers—i.e., the users or occupiers of a dock within the above definition. Unless, therefore, there be some special exclusion of sailors from the Act, a sailor clearing out a hold in a ship in dock is precisely in the same position to claim compensation against his employer as he would be if instead of being a sailor he had been a coal heaver in a coal bunker and his master had been a coal merchant instead of the owner of the ship. But there is no such exclusion to be found in the Act. The foundation for such suggestion, as I have pointed out, fails: and a sailor when employed as a workman in a ship in a dock is just as much drawn within the Act as any hand craftsman under the same circumstances. His position, of course, while at sea is quite different; he must get himself physically into a factory before he can get the benefit of the Act. The difference of his position at sea is pointed out by Lord Halsbury and Lord Shand in the case cited. It seems to me, therefore, that the authority of Raine v. Jobson concludes this case, and that the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J. read the following judgment:—I regret to be unable to deal with this appeal from the point of view of my learned colleagues. I think Judge Rentoul was right in his decision that the appellant was not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the loss of her husband, Edward Latimer Griffin. The material facts are these. The deceased man had joined the defendants' ship, the Royston Grange, at Liverpool under signed orders which bound him to serve the defendants as an able seaman on a round voyage to the River Plate and back to a home port. The vessel went from Liverpool to the Alexandra Dock, Newport, to take in her bunker coal, and, when the coaling was completed, she was moved out to buoys in the dock preparatory to proceeding to sea. While there the deceased man was employed in what was admitted to be the ordinary duty of a seaman—viz., in clearing up No. 3 hold for the reception of cargo. The accident to which his death was due occurred while he was so engaged. The learned County Court judge came to the conclusion that Griffin was not protected by the Act, and that the claim of his widow for compensation failed. Upon the argument of the appeal it was not disputed that, if the accident had occurred while the ship was at sea, the widow could not have maintained her right to compensation. But it was argued that the legislation embodied in the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 had altered the status of seamen on board when the vessel was not at sea and was lying in dock. The ship, it was said, while in dock was occupying part of a factory, and the sailors therefore were employed in a factory, and were protected by the Workmen's Compensation Act. In support of this contention reliance was placed on the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 and the judgment of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson. But I am unable to discover either in the statute or in the decision of the House of Lords any indication of an intention to extend the Workmen's Compensation Act to a class which had not previously been included in that statute. Full effect may be given to the Factory and Workshop Act and the decision, if both are treated as applicable to the class of workmen with which the Workmen's Compensation Act was clearly intended to deal—viz., workmen as distinguished from seamen. The argument for the appellant would lead to this extraordinary and, as it seems to me, unreasonable result—that a seaman while at sea would be outside the operation of the Act, but would become entitled to protection when in a position of comparative safety. I can see no reason for thinking that such a result could have been intended as the consequence of the application of the provisions of the Act of 1901 to the Workmen's Compensation Act. Further, I consider it unlikely that any change would have been made in the law which would affect existing as well as future contracts with seamen without a clear intimation to shipowners of their altered position. I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. read the following judgment:—The applicant is the administratrix of Edward Latimer Griffin, an able seaman on board the respondents' steamship Royston Grange. On her voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate the vessel proceeded to Newport to take in bunker coal. She arrived in the Alexandra Dock on the 24th Nov., and at midnight on the 28th Nov. she had finished receiving her bunker coal, and was moved out to the buoys in the dock preparatory to proceeding to sea on the following morning. While there, in the discharge of his duties as a seaman, Griffin met with an accident which resulted in his death. His Honour Judge Rentoul has held that as the deceased was a sailor, working as a sailor, he is not within the Act. By sect. 7 of the Act the term "workman" includes every person who is engaged in the employments to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise. The Act applies only to employment by undertakers as defined in the Act, including (inter alia) employment in, on, or about a factory, and "factory" includes a dock, and the undertaker of a factory is the occupier thereof. Now, it is clear that a ship, as such, is not a factory within the meaning of the Act, but I think it must be admitted, since the decision of the House of Lords of Raine v. Jobson (ubi sup.) and the decision in this court of Bartell v. Gray and Co. (ubi sup.), that a ship occupying a berth in a dock occupies part of a factory, with the result that the vessel in question was within the operation of the Act, and the shipowners were undertakers within the Act at the time when the accident happened. Unless, therefore, there are some words to be found expressly excluding seamen as such from the benefit of the Act, I think that the applicant must succeed. I can find nothing to put seamen in a worse position than would be any carpenter, painter, or other mechanic on board a ship while in dock. The observations of Lord Halsbury and of Lord Shand in Raine v. Jobson, to the effect that it was not within the contemplation of the statute to deal with the relations between shipowners and sailors when engaged in their occupation of sailing upon the seas, do not seem to apply where the vessel is not at sea, but where, within the meaning of the statute, it is lying in and occupying part of a factory. In my opinion, this appeal must be allowed.

Re EDUCATION ACT 1902; Re HEBBURN URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL AND HEDWORTH, MONKTON, AND JARROW UNITED DISTRICT SCHOOL BOARD'S ARBITRATION. (a).

Education — United district school board — Transfer to educational authorities — Different "appointed days" — Adjustment of liabilities — Immediate or postponed arbitration — Education Act 1902 (2 Edw. 7, c. 42), s. 27, sub-s. 2, sched. 2, clauses (1) (8) (22) — Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 68 — Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 2.

The H. Urban District Council is the local education authority for the H. Urban District. The 1st June 1903 was the "appointed day" for the coming into operation of the Education Act 1902 within the district. The corporation of J. and the county council of D. are respectively the local education authorities for the borough of J. and the rural district of M. At the passing of the Education Act 1902 the H., M., and J. United District School Board was the school board for the urban district of H., the rural district of M., and the borough of J. The 1st April 1904 was the appointed day for the coming into operation of that Act within the county of D. and the borough of J. Matters having arisen requiring adjustment between the council and the united district school board, and clause 1 of the second schedule to the Act providing that the rights and liabilities "of any school board" existing at the appointed day should be transferred to the council exercising the powers of the school board:

Held, that an arbitrator should be at once appointed to adjust such matters, and that the appointment should not be delayed until the appointed day for the remainder of the united district school board.

ADJOURNED summons raising the question whether the rights and liabilities inter se of a local education authority and a united district school board, part of which it has taken over, should be adjusted by arbitration forthwith, or await the transfer of the remaining parts of such school board to other education authorities.

The Hebburn Urban District Council is the local education authority under the Education Act 1902 for the urban district of Hebburn, an urban district with a population of over 20,000. The Board of Education had fixed the 1st June 1903 as the appointed day for the coming into operation of the Act within that district.

The corporation of Jarrow and the county council of Durham are respectively the local education authorities for the borough of Jarrow and the rural district of Monkton. At the time of the passing of the Education Act 1902 the Hedworth, Monkton, and Jarrow United District School Board was the school board for the borough of Jarrow, the urban district of Hebburn, and the rural district of Monkton.

The Board of Education fixed the 1st April 1904 for the coming into operation of that Act within the borough of Jarrow and the county of Durham.

Matters having arisen requiring adjustment between the Hebburn Urban District Council and the Hedworth, Monkton, and Jarrow United District School Board, on the 24th Oct. 1903 the Hedworth, Monkton, and Jarrow United District School Board were, at the instance of the Hebburn Urban District Council, served with a notice to concur with the board in the appointment of Mr. W. B. Keen, of London, accountant, as a single arbitrator, but would not agree.

By the Education Act 1902, s. 27, sub-s. 2:

This Act shall, except as expressly provided, come into operation on the appointed day, and the appointed day shall be the 26th day of March 1903, or such other day, not being more than eighteen months later, as the Board of Education may appoint, and different days may be appointed for different purposes and for different provisions of this Act and for different councils.

By the second schedule to the Act, clause 1 provides that

The property, powers, rights, and liabilities (including any property, powers, rights, and liabilities vested, conferred, or arising under any local Act or any trust deed) of any school board or school attendance committee existing at the appointed day, shall be transferred to the council exercising the powers of the school board.

By clause 8:

Sects. 85 to 88 of the Local Government Act 1894 [which contain transitory provisions] shall apply with respect to any transfer mentioned in this schedule, subject as follows: (a) References to "the appointed day" and to "the passing of this Act" shall be construed, as respects a case of relinquishment of powers and duties, as references to the date on which the relinquishment takes effect; and (b) the powers and duties of a school board, or school attendance committee, which is abolished, or a council which ceases under the provisions of this Act to exercise powers and duties, shall be deemed to be powers and duties transferred under

And by clause 22:

Sect. 68 of the Local Government Act 1894 (which relates to the adjustment of property and liabilities) shall apply with respect to any adjustment required for the purposes of this Act.

The Arbitration Act 1889 provides in the first schedule that If no other mode of reference is provided, the reference shall be to a single arbitrator.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. and W. M. Cann for the applicants.—The application is one under the recent Education Act 1902, incorporating the Local Government Act 1894, s. 68, by reference. The Hedworth, Monkton, and Jarrow United District School Board became severed under the Act, and vests in three different education authorities:

2 Edw. 7, c. 42, ss. 1, 27 (2).

The local education authority have throughout their area all the powers and duties of a school board: (sect. 5). We ask for an arbitrator to adjust the difficulties which almost daily arise, and we are told that we must wait until the appointed day for the other two districts. We are entitled to an immediate appointment clear of the county and borough councils. If they step into the place of the school board, they would have to adopt any proceedings which have taken place. We are the education authority for every purpose except higher education. We submit that the property, powers, and rights mentioned in clause 1 of the second schedule mean such part of the powers, authorities, and duties as are attributable to the school board under the Act. This adjustment is required for the purposes of this Act.

Sched. 2, clauses (8) (22):

56 & 57 Vict. c. 73, ss. 68, 85-88;

52 & 53 Vict. c. 49, s. 5;

Annual Practice 1904, vol. 2, pp. 554, 555;

Warrington, K.C. and Gatey for the united district school board.—The Act did not contemplate a piecemeal transfer, but a transfer as a whole. The only difference between a school board and a united school board is that the voters come from different districts. The school board is not the educational authority under the Act. The united district school board continues in existence as the body intrusted with education under the old Acts. It is impossible to give effect to the provisions of clause 16 of the second schedule, providing that officers of the authority transferred shall become officers of the transferee council, until the united board ceases to exist. They referred to sect. 27 sub-sect. 2, and sched. 2, clause 1.

KEKEWICH, J.—Those who followed the wearisome history of the Education Act 1902 might be surprised to hear that there was some point which had escaped observation, but so it was. I can find nothing in the Act which points to the conclusion that the existence of a united school board was present to the minds of those who framed this Act. If it had occurred to the framers of the Act, there would probably have been some express reference providing for the case. It does not follow that the Act will not fit it, and I am bound to construe this Act as meaning that all school boards, with their property, rights, and liabilities, shall be transferred to these new education authorities. But it was said that, admitting that the Act must apply in some way to united school boards, the transfer must not take place piecemeal, but must be done once for all—uno actu, so to speak. Undoubtedly there was much to be said in favour of that view. Clause 1 of the second schedule did contemplate one transfer, and one only. The result was that, if that clause was construed literally, according to the grammatical meaning of the words, there must be a single transfer, not a piecemeal transfer. But a difficulty arose when one had to deal with the transfer of a united school board and a transfer possibly to several educational authorities, as was the case here. Starting with the hypothesis that there was to be a transfer, sooner or later, it becomes necessary so to mould the meaning of the clause as to make it apply to the case of a united school board, where one transfer was not sufficient. I agree with the suggestion that this was an automatic transfer. It took effect by force of the Act of Parliament, so that there was in one sense one transfer; but when the transfer was to several authorities, that was equivalent to so many transfers by deed. That must be the meaning of the Act if it was to have the effect of transferring the whole of a united school board to more than one authority. The language of this second schedule has been criticised, and it was said that it was difficult to make it fit the possibility of more than one transfer. But the difficulty was not all on one side. According to the Act, there might be more than one appointed day for its coming into operation. There might be a transfer of a part of the school board to one educational authority, of another part to another educational authority, and the Board of Education might appoint one day for one authority and another day for the other; and, further, the Act enabled the Board of Education to appoint different days, not only for different councils, but for different purposes. Therefore it was quite competent for the Board of Education to say that, even as regarded Hebburn, the transfer should not be all at one time; and so with regard to Jarrow and Durham. If the clause was to be dealt with strictly and confined to a single transfer, one was met with this great difficulty—that the value of the Act was destroyed. The Act plainly contemplated more than one appointed day. It could only mean that the transfer should take place as often as was necessary, and that the transfer should extend on each appointed day so far as it ought to extend on that particular day. If that was so, there was no difficulty at all in construing the other clauses of the schedule. They all fell into line when once the difficulty of construing the first clause was got over. Then arose the question what was likely to require adjustment. The Legislature was silent as to that, and for a good reason. It contemplated that all sorts of questions might arise for adjustment, and it left that point entirely open. Practically any question of finance or anything else might be adjusted—for example, the question who was to pay a particular officer. But then it was objected that there could not be a complete adjustment because there were questions which would arise between the united school board and the two other educational authorities, which had not yet come into existence because the other appointed day had not arrived. But the answer to that was that the Hebburn authority was not concerned with those questions. Supposing the arbitration was concluded before the 1st April, the Hebburn authority would be out of it. All the questions between the Hebburn authority and the united school board were to be settled under the present arbitration. That arbitration would settle, for example, how much a particular officer was to be paid by the Hebburn authority. It was true that this arbitration might not be concluded on the 1st April. The result of that would be that the Jarrow and Durham authorities would step into the shoes of the united school board, and no serious difficulty would arise. In my opinion, whether the question is looked at as a matter of convenience or as a matter of strict construction of the Act of Parliament, there ought to be an arbitration at once. With regard to the question who is to be appointed arbitrator, I agree with the respondents that it is more convenient to appoint a local arbitrator. With regard to the costs, the summons raised a question of construction which could not have been settled without the assistance of the court, and under the circumstances I think that there should be no costs.

RIDOUT v. FOWLER (a).

Vendor and purchaser—Sale of land—Purchaser's interest before completion—Judgment creditor of purchaser—Receiver by way of equitable execution—Notice to vendor—Personal estate—Date of appointment—Effect of appointment.

The appointment of a receiver upon giving security does not, as regards personal property, become effectual until security is actually given, and does not refer back to the date of the original order.

Ex parte Evans; Re Watkins (41 L. T. Rep. 565; 13 Ch. Div. 252) distinguished.

*G. contracted to purchase land from the defendant, paid a deposit of 300*l., and received immediate possession. The plaintiff subsequently became a judgment creditor of G. and obtained a receiver in respect of G.'s interest in the land. Notice of the receivership was given to the defendant.

*G. failed to pay the purchase money, and the defendant gave notice of rescission to G., who thereupon commenced an action for the return of the deposit. That action was settled at a date subsequent to the order appointing the receiver, but anterior to security being given. By the terms of the consent order the defendant paid G. 110*l., and G. agreed to give up possession.

*Held, that G. never acquired the ownership in equity of the land, and that consequently the receivership did not create a charge or lien. With regard to the 110*l.* paid by the defendant to G., the receiver, not having given security at the date of the payment, had not been effectually appointed, and therefore had no claim to be paid that money. Further, even if the receivership had been in force, the order appointing a receiver having failed to constitute a charge or lien, notice of the appointment did not do so; and the defendant incurred no liability by paying the money to G. direct.*

In June 1901 the defendant, who had been for some time past the owner of Oakleigh Lodge, Sunbury, Middlesex, and the land and cottages adjoining (hereafter called the premises), agreed to sell the premises to Albert Edward Green, who paid a deposit of 300*l.*, and was thereupon allowed by the defendant to at once go into possession.

The plaintiff was a creditor of Green, and in 1901 had commenced an action against Green to recover certain moneys due to him. On the 1st July 1902 judgment was given in that action that the plaintiff should recover the sum of 55*l.* and costs, which subsequently on taxation were found to amount to 100*l.* 7*s.*; and on the 18th Aug. 1902 an order was made in the same action that Edmund Frank Ridout be appointed receiver (upon first giving security) to receive the rents, profits, and moneys receivable in respect of the said Albert Edward Green's interest in the premises and pay the balances on his accounts in or towards satisfaction of what should for the time being be due in respect of the above-mentioned judgment debt and costs.

Edmund Frank Ridout did not give security until the 29th May 1903. Notice of the receivership order was given on the 9th Aug. 1902 to the present defendant, and the order was on the 12th Aug. 1902 registered under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act 1888 and the Land Charges Act 1900.

Meanwhile the defendant had given formal notice to Green on the 8th March 1902 rescinding the agreement for sale of the premises. On the 29th May 1902 Green commenced an action in the Chancery Division against the defendant claiming the return of the deposit of 300*l.* In this action the defendant counter-claimed for specific performance.

Finally, on the 16th June 1903 an order was made by consent in the action. This order directed Green to deliver up possession of the premises to the defendant, and ordered the defendant to pay to Green 110*l.* The contract for sale of the premises was rescinded, and all further proceedings in the action and counter-claim were stayed.

A question was raised whether the 110*l.* paid to Green by the defendant was paid as a part return of the deposit; the defendant, in announcing the terms of settlement to the present plaintiff by letter, had taken the view that it was a return of deposit.

On the 30th May 1903 the plaintiff in the present action commenced proceedings asking for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge or lien upon the premises for securing the sum of 155*l.* 7*s.* (due from Green in respect of the above-mentioned judgment debt and costs), together with interest thereon; and for payment of the same by the defendant.

Bramwell Davis, K.C. and T. K. Crossfield for the plaintiff.—We submit that the receivership constituted a charge on Green's interest in Oakleigh Lodge on the ground that Green's interest was an equitable ownership of the property subject to payment of the purchase money, and therefore real property. If it were personalty, we agree there would not be a lien; but the receivership was really in respect of realty, and therefore constituted a charge under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110:

Ex parte Evans; Re Watkins, 41 L. T. Rep. 565; 13 Ch. Div. 252.

This case also decides that the appointment of a receiver relates back to the date of the order appointing him, whenever the order is perfected by the giving of security. If Green's interest were held to be personalty, we certainly could not allege that the receivership constituted a charge on it:

Re Marquis of Anglesey; Countess de Gaires v. Gardner, 89 L. T. Rep. 534; (1903) 2 Ch. 727.

See also on the same point:

Levasseur v. Mason and Barry Limited, 64 L. T. Rep. 761; (1891) 2 Q. B. 73.

But we submit that, notice of the receiver having been given to the defendant, he was prevented from dealing direct with Green and ignoring our claim, and that we ought to have received the portion of the deposit returned. There are analogous cases relating to solicitors' liens:

Price v. Crouch, 60 L. J. 767, Q. B.

[FARWELL, J.—From the case of Shaw v. Foster (27 L. T. Rep. 281; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 321) it is clear that mere notice could not put such a burden on the defendant as your argument suggests.] That case turned on the question of the sufficiency of the notice. There is no question of the sort here.

Webster for the defendant.—Green's interest was never an interest in realty. This is clearly shown by James, L.J.'s dictum in Rayner v. Preston (43 L. T. Rep. 18; 18 Ch. Div. 1, at p. 13): "I agree that it is not accurate to call the relation between the vendor and purchaser of an estate under a contract, while the contract is in fieri, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust." As to the position of the receiver with regard to personalty, Re Potts; Ex parte Taylor (69 L. T. Rep. 74; (1893) 1 Q. B. 648) is clear.

FARWELL, J.—The plaintiff in this case seeks to enforce a claim under the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution which he has obtained. [His Lordship here stated the facts, and continued:] The plaintiff has commenced these proceedings for the purpose of enforcing against the vendor, Fowler, some claim or charge against, first of all, the land contracted to be sold by the defendant to Green, and, secondly, the 110*l.* which was paid by the defendant to Green under the compromise of the 16th Jan. 1903. In my opinion both claims fail. As regards the land, it entirely depends on the nature of the interest which the purchaser Green acquired under the contract. A person who gets equitable execution can only acquire interest in property that his debtor himself possesses. Now, the right of a vendor and purchaser has been explained so often it is perhaps hardly worth while to go through it again. It is sufficient to refer to what Lord Hatherley says in Shaw v. Foster (27 L. T. Rep. 281; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 321, at p. 356), where he quotes his own words in a previous case: "It is quite true that authorities may be cited as establishing the proposition that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does, in a certain sense, exist between vendor and purchaser; that is to say, when a man agrees to sell his estate he is trustee of the legal estate for the person who has purchased it as soon as the contract is completed, but not before." Then he cites the expression used by Sir Thomas Plumer in Wall v. Bright (1 Jac. & W. 503): "The vendor, therefore, is not a mere trustee; he is in progress towards it, and finally becomes such when the money is paid, and when he is bound to convey." James, L.J. puts it perhaps even more clearly in Rayner v. Preston (43 L. T. Rep. 18; 18 Ch. Div. 1, at p. 13) in the passage that has already been read: "I agree that it is not accurate to call the relation between the vendor and purchaser of an estate under a contract, while the contract is in fieri, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust. But that is because it is uncertain whether the contract will or will not be performed, and the character in which the parties stand to one another remains in suspense as long as the contract is in fieri. But when the contract is performed by actual conveyance, or performed in everything but the mere formal act of sealing the engrossed deeds, then that completion relates back to the contract, and it is thereby ascertained that the relation was throughout that of trustee and cestui que trust. That is to say, it is ascertained that while the legal estate was in the vendor, the beneficial or equitable interest was wholly in the purchaser. And that, in my opinion, is the correct definition of a trust estate." Now, here it is quite clear that the relationship never was completed by the completion of the contract, and therefore there was no estate in land, in the events that have happened, on which this order by way of equitable execution could have operated. If it had operated, it would have created a charge upon the land, and different considerations would have arisen. That disposes of any question of a charge upon the real estate, because, by reason of the events that have happened and which the plaintiff in the present action could not interfere with or prevent, no actual estate in the land has ever belonged to the debtor at all. Now comes the question of personal estate. It is conceded, and rightly conceded, that no charge is created on personal estate. That is put very clearly in the case of Re Potts; Ex parte Taylor (69 L. T. Rep. 74; (1893) 1 Q. B. 648), in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., who sums up the state of the law on p. 661 as follows: "The order not constituting a charge or lien, notice of it did not make it so." In this case, however, there is to my mind a fatal preliminary objection. When the compromise took place on the 16th Jan. 1903, there was no receiver appointed who was in a position to come and say, "Pay me the money." For security was not given till the 29th May 1903. It is true that in Ex parte Evans (41 L. T. Rep. 365; 13 Ch. Div. 252) the Court of Appeal, in a decision which binds me, decided that the form of order appointing a receiver upon giving security did not delay the date of delivery in execution as regards real estate; but, security being afterwards given, the appointment related back, so that the charge crystallised as at the date of the original order. Still, I am of opinion that it is settled, as regards personalty, that, when the order is of the form mentioned above, the appointment does not become effectual till security is in fact given; it is a conditional appointment, and the condition is a condition precedent. The practice where such an order has been made is this: when the order is taken to be drawn up, the registrar requires the parties to go before the master to settle the security; he does not pass or enter the order till he is satisfied by proper evidence that the security is given, and then, and then only, does he pass and enter the order. Now the receiver, unless he had an office copy of the order with him, could not go and claim any money to which as receiver he might be entitled. His title would not be complete, and he could not give a receipt or obtain the money. How, therefore, does any question arise as to the payment of the 110*l.*? That appears to me to be a fatal objection. Further, as I have already said, there is no charge on the personal estate; and, that being so, I cannot see on what possible ground it can be alleged that a person who merely gives notice of the receivership and does no more thereby creates any charge in his own favour. If there were any question as to this, the judgment of Lindley, L.J., to which I have already referred, fully disposes of it. That really settles the matter; but in fact and in truth I do not think the question arises, because there is nothing whatever, except a statement in a letter, which in my view is in no way conclusive, to show that the 110*l.* was in fact part of the deposit. To decide this, however, it is necessary to consider the purchaser's rights in respect of the deposit which he has paid. He has a right to a lien and to have the deposit repaid to him; and according to Rose v. Watson (10 L. T. Rep. 106; 10 H. L. C. 672), which I recently followed in Whitbread and Co. v. Watt (84 L. T. Rep. 419; 86 L. T. Rep. 395; (1901) 1 Ch. 911; (1902) 1 Ch. 835), this right attaches from the moment of payment, subject to the condition that the purchase does not go off through the purchaser's own fault. He has no absolute right to this lien or to repayment of the deposit at all—it is conditional on his not being in default; if he is in default, his right ceases to exist. I can see in the present case that there was every appearance of the purchaser Green being in default, and, however that may be, on the face of the order—which is, after all, the conclusive matter, and shows what the agreement was—no deposit was in fact returned; but the vendor, being in the unfortunate position of having a man who was unable or unwilling to pay a debt of 55*l.* in occupation of his lands without having paid the balance (amounting to 2850*l.*) of the purchase money, saw no chance of getting it, and gave him 110*l.* to go out of possession. I can only say it would be most unfortunate if a decision of this court was to prevent an arrangement of this sort being given effect to when no offer has ever been made by the present plaintiff to step into the shoes of the defaulting purchaser and pay the purchase money. The plaintiff has tried to get as near as he can to the position of a mortgagee, but the mortgagee in a similar case would be bound in some way or other to undertake the liabilities of his mortgagor. The truth is that a man in the position of the plaintiff cannot, by giving a mere notice, put a burden upon a creditor of his debtor. The order operates, no doubt, as an injunction against his own debtor to restrain that debtor from receiving the money, but it does not in any way affect the person who is going to pay the money under circumstances such as the present. The result is that the action fails and is dismissed with costs.

By an Inclosure Act and award certain waste land was allotted amongst commoners. The Act provided that nothing therein contained should be construed to diminish the rights of the lord of the manor in respect to his seignory and royalties except in respect of his ownership of the soil to be enclosed. And the Act further provided that the lord and his successors should hold and enjoy all mines and quarries under the waste together with liberty of searching for, winning and working the same, as fully and freely as if that Act had not been passed, and that without making or paying any satisfaction for so doing. And the Act further provided a summary means by which any person injured through the lord's working of the mines should be compensated by the occupiers of allotments in the same township.

Held, in action brought by surface owners against an assign of the lord to restrain by injunction any injury to the surface by mining operations, that there was nothing in the Inclosure Act to deprive a surface owner of his common law right of support (the clause as to compensation in the Act relating to surface user only), and that consequently the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction.

By a private Act passed in the reign of George II (31 Geo. 2, c. 1.) a large common or moor situate within the townships of Hamaterly, South Bedburn, Lynesack, and Softley, in the manor of Wolsingham and chapelry of Hamaterly, in the county of Durham, containing about 7000 acres, was inclosed. The Act recited that the Bishop of Durham was lord of the manor of Wolsingham in right of his church and see and entitled to the soil of the common, and provided in the usual manner for the division, apportionment, and allotment of the moor among the several persons having an interest as freehold or copyhold tenants in the same as in the Act provided. The Act further (pp. 11 and 12 thereof) provided that nothing therein contained should be construed to defeat,

The Act provided:

And whereas great inconveniences may happen, and damage be done to particular persons by the reason of the searching for winning and working the mines and quarries within and under their respective allotments by the said Lord Bishop of Durham, his successors and assigns, without making or paying any satisfaction for so doing. For remedy thereof be it hereby enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that when and so often as any person or persons shall suffer or sustain any loss or damage in his, her, or their respective allotments by the searching for winning and working of the mines and quarries therein, or the laying and repairing waggon ways and other ways, or by the loading and carrying away the coals, lead, minerals, stones, or other things to be gotten thereout, or making drifts, levels, and water courses, or erecting or using fire engines or other engines, pit room, or other the liberties and powers hereby given and reserved to the said Lord Bishop of Durham, his successors or assigns, upon complaint thereof, and by such person or persons so damaged as aforesaid to one or more justice or justices of the peace in and for the said county of Durham (notice of such intended complaint having been first given by such person or persons in the chapel or hamlet aforesaid on some Sunday morning preceeding such complaint), such justice or justices is and are hereby empowered and required to examine and inquire into such complaint or complaints in a summary way either by the examination of witnesses on oath, or being of the people called Quakers upon their solemn affirmation [&c.] or by such other evidence or proof, ways or means as to them or him shall seem requisite or expedient in that behalf; and finally to assess, settle, and determine the damages sustained by such persons or person as aforesaid, which damages shall be paid and borne by the occupiers of the several other allotments lying and being in such and the same township in which the allotment or allotments in which such damages shall be committed shall lie according to the respective yearly values or rents of such allotments in such proportion and shares as the said justice or justices shall direct or appoint. And in case any person or persons chargeable with or contributable to such damage as aforesaid shall neglect to pay his, her, or their said proportions thereof within a time to be limited by the said justice or justices to the said person so injured as aforesaid, then and in such case the said justice or justices by warrant under his or their hand and seal hands and seals shall and they are hereby required to cause the same to be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such persons or person so neglecting or refusing to pay the same as aforesaid, rendering the overplus (if any be), after deducting the reasonable charges of such distress and sale, to the owner or owners of such goods and chattels upon demand.

Certain of the commons named in the award were, as is more fully explained in the judgment, persons of great territorial influence in the county of Durham.

The rights of the Bishops of Durham, as lords of the manor, subsequently became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and by them a mining lease of mines under a portion of the inclosed common had been granted to the Butterknowle Colliery Company Limited. The Bishop Auckland Industrial Co-operative Flour and Provision Society Limited were the surface owners of four acres which prior to the inclosure Act were part of the waste, and which were allotted under the Act.

The action was brought by the Bishop Auckland Industrial Co-operative Flour and Provision Society Limited against the Butterknowle Colliery Company Limited, claiming a declaration that the defendants were not entitled as against the plaintiffs as surface owners to lower and depress the surface of their lands and for an injunction.

Upjohn, K.C. and Leigh Clare for the plaintiffs. —The defendants claim through the Bishop of Durham as lord of the manor. Consequently, their rights are simply those of an ordinary lord of a manor. The lord is no doubt entitled to the soil of the waste; but he must exercise his rights in such a way as to leave sufficient pasturage for the commoners. Under the award the soil is granted to the plaintiffs, and they are entitled to the support of the surface. To disprove this, the defendants must show that on the construction of the inclosure Act the plaintiffs are deprived of this prima facie right. If the surface is sold and the minerals reserved, the owner of the minerals has not a right to let down the surface:

[FARWELL, J.—The decision in Hert v. Gill has been stated by the Lord Chancellor, in Re Todd, Birleston, and Co. v. North-Eastern Railway Company (88 L. T. Rep. 366; (1903) 1 K. B. 603, at p. 607) to be inconsistent with his observations in Lord Provost of Glasgow v. Fairie (60 L. T. Rep. 274; 13 App. Cas. 657), and that he intended them to be so taken.] Every inclosure Act must be construed by itself. The fact that in this Act the minerals are reserved to the lord, and that he is given liberty to work them will not justify him in destroying the surface. Nor will a compensation clause of itself be sufficient to deprive the surface owner of his right to support:

New Sharlston Collieries Company v. Earl of Westmorland, 82 L. T. Rep. 725.

The provision for compensation in the present Act is inadequate.

Danckwerts, K.C. and MacSwinney for the defendants.—The Act shows that the lord is entitled to destroy the surface for the purpose of working. It must be noted that he is entitled to quarry as well as to work mines:

Duke of Buccleuch v. Wakefield, 23 L. T. Rep. 102;

Bell v. Earl of Dudley, 72 L. T. Rep. 14; (1895) 1 Ch. 102.

The Bishop of Durham was a prince bishop of a county palatine, and he had greater rights than an ordinary manorial lord. The fact that compensation is to be paid tends to show that the commoners have not the right of support:

Conselt Waterworks Company v. Ritson, 60 L. T. Rep. 360.

[This case was not reported on appeal. But the transcript of the shorthand-writer's notes were produced in court.] The present Act was considered by the court in Gill v. Dickinson (42 L. T. Rep. 510; 5 Q. B. Div. 159), and it was held that the lord of manor had the right to let down the surface by mining without making compensation.

Upjohn, K.C. in reply.—It is possible to satisfy every part of the Act without interfering with the right of support. The surface may be supported by artificial means.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J.—The question in this case turns on the construction of an inclosure Act (31 Geo. 2, c. 1). The plaintiffs are surface owners and the defendants are lessees of minerals claiming under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (who derive their title from the Bishop of Durham), and the short point is whether the defendants, working in the ordinary manner, and not negligently, are entitled to let down and destroy the surface of the lands in question. The lands contain four acres, and are situate within the parish of Hamsterly, in the manor of Wolsingham, and were, prior to the inclosure Act, part of the waste of the manor. The lord of the manor was seised of the soil of the manor, and entitled to the mines and minerals thereunder in fee simple, subject only to the ordinary rights of pasturage in the commoners. This right involved some restriction on the lord's right of working and getting in the minerals—viz., that he must leave a sufficiency of pasturage for the commoners. The commons and wastes of the manor were duly inclosed and divided by an award under the said Act of George II. Questions of the construction of inclosure Acts have frequently been before the courts, and although each of course depends on the working of the particular Act, there is sufficient similarity between them to warrant the deduction of some general principles applicable to all such Acts, and, indeed, those principles have been settled by numerous decisions, many of them in the House of Lords, and may be stated as follows: The surface owner has by common law the right to have proper support for his surface, so as to prevent its subsidence. If the mineral owner contests this right, the burden is on him to displace it; the right can only be displaced by express words, or by necessary implication from the words used in the Act—words, however large, applicable to the right of working and privileges connected with it and important for the exercise of such rights and privileges, are not enough, at any rate, if the words used are fairly applicable to the ordinary entering on and working the mine: (see Lord Selborne's judgment in Love v. Bell, 51 L. T. Rep. 1; 9 App. Cas. 289, 290, 291). The absence of any provision for compensation is strong evidence in favour of the continuance of the right to support; so also is the presence of a compensation clause limited to injuries arising from ordinary surface use, or obviously inadequate to any greater injury; but a compensation clause providing expressly for injuries to buildings, or other injury resulting from subsidence is in favour of the destruction of the right. But this is a question of construction, as stated by Lord Davey in New Sharlston Collieries Company v. Earl of Westmorland (82 L. T. Rep. 725, at p. 726), the existence of an express provision for compensation and for letting down the surface does not necessarily authorise the mineowner to let it down. The question is one of construction in each case, and the principles are the same, whether the document be a grant or lease or inclosure Act. The latter is nothing but a statutory agreement between the parties, or, as Lord Selborne puts it (9 App. Cas. 290), it is a case of mutual considerations resulting in the apportionment of land to which the parties have agreed or have had determined by the party making the award. It is important to ascertain whether the rights of the owners of the minerals are merely reserved or whether they are newly created by grant. In the latter case there is more ground than in the former for an argument that the ordinary common law right of support has been displaced: (Duke of Buccleuch v. Wakefield, 23 L. T. Rep. 102; 4 H. L. 377; Love v. Bell, 51 L. T. Rep. 1; 9 App. Cas. 291, 292). The reservation of the lord's right to be enjoyed in as full and ample a manner as if the Act had not been passed, is not equivalent to a reservation, free from the common law liability to leave support, merely because the only liability before the Act was to leave sufficient pasture, but is to be read as subject to the ordinary maxim, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non ledas, so that, mutatis mutandis, it becomes subject to the substituted ownership right of support in lieu of the extinguished commoners right of pasturage (9 App. Cas. 292), and, accordingly, if there were no such commonable rights no substituted right of support can be maintained: (Gill v. Dickinson, 42 L. T. Rep. 510; 5 Q. B. Div. 159). In the case before me the lands inclosed were about 7000 acres, and provision is made in the usual way for their allotment amongst the several persons having a right of common therein in certain proportions, as freehold or copyhold, as the case might be (in the case before me the allotment to the plaintiff's predecessors in title was freehold) and then at pp. 12 and 13 come the clauses on which the question chiefly turns. I will not pause to read them through; but, bearing in mind the principles to which I have already referred, I remark (1) that, in my opinion, the mines and minerals are reserved and not granted; and (2) that they are granted subject to the principle Sic utere tuo, &c. As to (1) the fee simple was vested in the lord at the passing of the Act, and there is nothing in the Act to take it away from him until the award is made, and which is necessarily in futuro. The provision at p. 6 is "all such lands as shall . . . be allotted to any person, shall be vested and held by such person. . . . The words at p. 13 are words operating de presenti and take effect by way of reservation, of the existing estate. Nor, are there any such unusual powers or provisions therein contained, as would not follow from or be incident to a mere reservation. On (2) I observe that the words "as fully and freely as he or they might or could have had and enjoyed the same in case this Act had not been made or in immediate collocation with and precede the words "and that without making or paying any satisfaction for so doing." These latter words excluding compensation afford, in my opinion, very strong grounds for limiting the reservation to the ordinary rights of ownership; if it is not so the inference to antecedent title is meaningless; but the emphasis on the nonpayment of compensation ("and that too," &c.) follow immediately on the words referring to the antecedent title, and are to be read with them, and when so read amount to the reasonable and intelligent provision, that so long as the mineral owners work in exercise of their usual common law rights they are to pay no compensation to anyone. I further observe on this clause that the reserved liberties may all be satisfied by the exercise of surface rights; but that even if and so far as they may extend to the injury of the surface by working, it is to be remembered that the reservation in this case extends to quarries as well as to mines, and that the usual mode of working a quarry necessarily destroys the surface. If, then, any words are found in the next clause, which appear to point to the destruction of the surface by working, they may well be satisfied by applying them to the quarries and stone reserved reddendo singula singulis so as not unnecessarily to destroy the subject-matter of the property allotted to the commoners. Further, I can find in the next clause providing for compensation, no such wide phrases or rights as influenced Lord Lindley's judgment in the Consett Waterworks Company v. Ritson case; all appears to be quite consistent with the working of mines and quarries in the ordinary way and subject to the ordinary rights of the surface owners. Further, the fact that the compensation is to be paid by the occupiers of the other allotments and not by the owner confirms me in my view; the amount of compensation payable for the usual surface user could not well be large—that for letting down the surface with buildings thereon might be enormous; but the people to pay are not the owners in fee, but the occupiers, and only such occupiers as occupy allotments in the same township. If the Legislature really contemplated the payment of substantial compensation to occupiers—probably for the most part, shepherds, hinds, and gamekeepers —who knew nothing of the existence of any such liability, and might find all their property sold under a distraint without its sufficing to discharge a hundredth part of the amount of damage done. If consideration of justice to the party liable to pay and of sufficiency of satisfaction to the person entitled to receive are of any weight, they appear to me to be strongly in favour of the preservation of the right to support. If the defendants are right the occupation as a yearly tenant of a small house in the district might entail ruin on the occupier. Further, the persons liable to pay in respect of damage to the allotment injured are the occupiers of other allotments within that township. It appears from page 1 that there are four townships comprised in the Act. Suppose them to be of equal extent, so that each contains 1725 acres. This is not a large area, and may quite possibly be in the occupation of two farmers in farms of practically equal amount and value. If farmer A. is injured by his surface being let down, his neighbour B. must pay him compensation for it. If B. is injured A. must pay him. If the injury be for the ordinary surface user, it is practically certain that they will not suffer alike, and the amounts payable would be small. But assume that both farmhouses are let down, as might well happen, the idea that each compensates the other appears to me too ludicrous to be adopted unless it is unavoidable. Again, suppose the size of the four townships to be unequal so that there is one containing as little as 500 or 600 acres. This may well be the farm of one man. Is he to pay himself if his farmhouse is let down, or is he to distraint upon such of his labourers and carters as happen to occupy cottages in the township? The ordinary surface user by roads and the like would avoid buildings, so that the question would not arise, but underground workings are more likely to cause subsidence where there is the additional weight of buildings superimposed than where the surface is unbuilt upon. In my opinion the mode of obtaining compensation provided by the Act is quite inadequate to provide a sufficient amount, and might well have the effect of depopulating the area subject to such a liability, and so become more and more inadequate. Is there, then, any authority which prevents me from deciding in accordance with my own opinion? There is one reported case on this very Act, Gill v. Dickinson (42 L. T. Rep. 510; 5 Q. B. Div. 159), for I cannot pay any regard to a case merely noted in the Weekly Notes, but the reasoning on which that case proceeded is quite consistent with my view. The case was heard on demurrer; and it was admitted, and the judgment of the court turned on the admission, that before the Act the lord worked as he pleased without paying any satisfaction, and the decision was that the Act preserved the status quo ante. Here the admissions are that the commoners had the usual right of common of pasturage which involves the limitations of the right of working that I have above stated. Bell v. Lord Dudley (72 L. T. Rep. 14; (1895) 1 Ch. 182) is also distinguishable, for there was there an adequate compensation clause. But the case most relied on by Mr. Danckwerts was the Consett Waterworks Company v. Ritson (60 L. T. Rep. 380, reversed in the Court of Appeal), with the shorthand notes of the judgments in which I have been supplied. In my opinion that case is also distinguishable. Lord Esher's first point was that the Act was to be construed having regard to the position of the parties affected, and that the Bishop of Durham was one of the most powerful landowners, and had "immense powers," and that the humbler commoners were glad to take such crumbs as he deigned to give them. But in the case before me the two first-named commoners are Lord Darlington and his son, William Lord Vane; and I venture to think that the owners of Raby Castle and the enormous estates attached to it stood on equal terms even with the Prince Bishop of Durham, and, in addition to this, their political influence is a matter of history. Lord Darlington married a sister of Sir James Lowther, afterwards Lord Lonsdale, whose political influence as the owner of nine pocket boroughs is notorious, and Lord Vane owed his subsequent advancement to a marquise and dukedom to the possession of six pocket boroughs. If the position of the parties be a legitimate consideration I cannot think that the bishop had in this case any such commanding advantage as Lord Esher found that he possessed in the Consett case. The next point was the compensation clause. But in that case it was adequate. An estate was allotted to create a fund, and the owners as well as the occupiers of 30,000, and not as here of a few hundred, acres were made to contribute; and further, there were large powers referred to by Lord Lindley which are not to be found in the present case. Not only can I find nothing in any of the cases which compels me to decide contrary to my own opinion, but I have great doubt whether the Consett case or Bell v. Lord Dudley can stand with the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in New Sharlston Collieries Company v. Lord Westmorland (82 L. T. Rep. 725). The only question raised in this action is with respect to mines, and I make the declaration and grant the injunction as asked, and direct an inquiry as to damages. The defendants must pay the costs of the action; the costs of the inquiry will be reserved.

COLWELL AND OTHERS v. ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH COUNCIL (a).

Nuisance—Electric lighting works—Vibration and noise—Borough council—Injunction.

Under a provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament, the St. P. Borough Council supplied electricity in the borough, and for this purpose had an electric generating station about 50ft. from the nearest point of a row of houses. The provisional order provided that nothing contained in it should exonerate the council from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them.

In May 1903 the council began to run new and enlarged works and machinery at the generating station, including two engines each of about 750 horse-power. The lessees and occupiers of the row of houses complained that the new machinery increased an already existing nuisance by vibration and noise so as to interfere with their comfort and enjoyment, cause injury to health, and diminish the value of their interests in their houses; and they brought an action against the council claiming an injunction restraining them from causing nuisance to the plaintiffs and damaging their interests in their houses by vibration and noise from the electric generating station, and damages. The defendants contended that the vibration and noise were due to certain defects in the balance of the engines which they were endeavouring to remedy, and which they ought to be allowed time to remedy completely.

Held, on the evidence, that the vibration and noise were productive of an amount of annoyance against which the plaintiffs were entitled to be protected on the principle laid down in Broder v. Saillard (2 Ch. Div. 692) and Bamford v. Turnley (6 L. T. Rep. 721; 3 B. & S. 62); that the annoyance was not merely temporary and occasional, but calculated to work material injury to the plaintiffs' property; that the defendants were not entitled to carry on their works unless they could do so without occasioning a nuisance; and that an injunction must be granted, with an inquiry as to damages.

TRIAL OF ACTION.

By the St. Pancras (Middlesex) Electric Lighting Order 1883, confirmed by the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 7) Act 1883 (45 & 47 Vict. c. cccix.), the Vestry of St. Pancras were authorised to supply electricity within the parish of St. Pancras, and for that purpose to acquire lands and construct works. The order provided (by sect. 71) that nothing contained in it should exonerate the vestry from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them. Subsequently to 1883 the vestry constructed an electric generating station at a distance of about 50ft. from the nearest point of certain houses, numbered 108 to 116 (even numbers), in Great College-street, St. Pancras. From time to time complaints had been made by the occupiers of these houses and other persons in the vicinity regarding the vibration and noise caused by the generating station, and the consequent discomfort and injury to their property; and legal proceedings were at one time instituted, but were compromised. Under the provisions of the London Government Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 14) the parish of St. Pancras became a metropolitan borough, and the powers and duties and property of the vestry were, by sect. 4, transferred to the borough council. In 1902 the borough council determined to enlarge the generating station and to erect new machinery there. The lessees and occupiers of the houses in Great College-street sent to the council a notice that they protested against this proposed increase in the plant and machinery; but the council nevertheless adhered to their intention, and the new machinery was completed and began to work in May 1903. It included two engines each of about 750 horse-power.

COLWELL AND OTHERS v. ST. PANCRAZ BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[CHAN. DIV.]

The lessees and occupiers complained that the nuisance and annoyance arising from the generating station were greatly increased by the new machinery; their comfort and enjoyment of their houses were interfered with by the vibration and noise; injury to health was alleged in some cases, and the value of their interests in their houses was diminished, particularly in the case of one occupier who let lodgings. They accordingly on the 30th Nov. 1903 commenced this action against the borough council, claiming an injunction restraining the defendants from causing nuisance to the plaintiffs and damaging the value of their interests in their houses by vibration and noise from the electric generating station, and damages. Relief was also claimed in respect of an alleged nuisance from dust, noisome fumes, and smells arising from the defendants' dust destructor, which was situated close to the generating station and worked in connection with it; but on this part of the case the parties came to terms during the hearing. The defendants did not admit that there was nuisance, and contended that, if there was any vibration and noise of which the plaintiffs had cause to complain, it was due to the fact that the engines were at present defective in balance; that this would take time to remedy, but that they were endeavouring to remedy it, and had already effected an improvement, and would in time be able to remove it completely. Evidence was given as to the nuisance complained of and the nature and causes of the defect in the working of the engines.

Hughes, K.C. and E. Beaumont for the plaintiffs.—If, as we contend, what the defendants are doing amounts to a nuisance, they are not entitled to demand an unlimited time to remedy it. Where, as here, a prescriptive right has not been acquired, a nuisance like this cannot be committed:

St. Helen's Smelting Company v. Tipping, 12 L. T. Rep. 776; 11 H. L. C. 642;

Sturges v. Bridgman, 41 L. T. Rep. 219; 11 Ch. Div. 852.

Even if there was a nuisance of which we might have complained before the new engines were erected, we are entitled to be protected against the increase of it which has been caused by them:

Heather v. Pardon, 37 L. T. Rep. 393.

Our evidence establishes a serious and continuing nuisance, and we are entitled to an injunction:

Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Company, 70 L. T. Rep. 762; and in the Court of Appeal, 72 L. T. Rep. 34; (1895) 1 Ch. 287.

Bousfield, K.C., Younger, K.C., and A. B. Marten for the defendants.—A statutory duty to construct and use these works has been thrown upon us, and therefore, if we use our best skill and diligence, we are not liable for consequential injury (Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29), except that sect. 71 of our provisional order precludes us from committing a permanent nuisance. But we are not liable for a temporary nuisance arising from the execution of our statutory duty:

Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company, 64 L. T. Rep. 864; (1891) 2 Ch. 409.

We are endeavouring to remedy the cause of complaint, and must be allowed time to do so.

Hughes, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—JOYCE, J.—It has virtually been admitted, and, indeed, it can hardly be denied, that the plaintiffs have a right to complain by reason of the vibration caused by the defendants' works and machinery at various times and from time to time between May and Dec. 1903, unless the annoyance was a merely temporary one. If it be continued, the defendants cannot deny the existence of a nuisance in law. In other words, it appears to me that the vibration caused by the defendants' works has been productive of so much annoyance to the plaintiffs as to justify this action, unless the defendants can excuse themselves by showing that the annoyance is merely a temporary one, or in the nature of that referred to by Williams, L.J. (then Williams, J.) in Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company (64 L. T. Rep. 864; (1891) 2 Ch. 409). I consider that the amount of annoyance caused to the plaintiffs has materially interfered with their comfort, and, as Sir G. Jessel, M.R. said in Broder v. Saillard (2 Ch. Div. 692, at p. 701): "The law is this, that a man is entitled to the comfortable enjoyment of his dwelling-house. If his neighbour makes such a noise"—or causes such a vibration—"as to interfere with the ordinary use and enjoyment of his dwelling-house, so as to cause serious annoyance and disturbance, the occupier is entitled to be protected from it." In my opinion there has been such an amount of annoyance here; but it is suggested that the defendants are entitled to be excused on the principle of Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company (ubi sup.) Is the annoyance caused by the defendants within the principle of law laid down in that case? In my opinion it is not. The law on the subject is correctly stated by Bramwell B. in Bamford v. Turnley (6 L. T. Rep. 721; 3 B. & S. 62, at p. 82), and in that case he deals also with the question whether the defendants ought to be excused on the ground that the annoyance is merely a temporary one. The annoyance caused by the defendants in the present case is in my opinion not merely temporary and occasional, but calculated to work material injury to the property of the plaintiffs and seriously to depreciate its value, though that, perhaps, is not a ground of action by itself. In the provisional order authorising their works there is a clause providing that nothing therein contained shall exonerate them from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them. But, in spite of this provision, it has been suggested that the defendants, for a period perhaps of years after the erection of their works, are entitled to make the neighbourhood uninhabitable and cause a serious nuisance until the time comes when they can carry on their works without producing these results. It has not been explained what is to happen if that turns out to be impossible. But the proposition appears to me an entirely strange one, and I cannot accede to it. It seems to me that the owners of such works are not entitled to carry them on unless they can do so without occasioning a nuisance. In the present case none of the machinery has been working long enough for a prescriptive right to occasion a nuisance to be acquired, and I must grant an injunction restraining the defendants from carrying on their works so as to cause nuisance or injury to the plaintiffs during the continuance of their leases by vibration, noise, or otherwise, with an inquiry as to damages.

Younger, K.O. asked that the operation of the injunction might be suspended, and, after some discussion, his Lordship suspended it for a period of six months, on certain terms as to the hours of the night during which noise or vibration was not to be caused.

BRIGHT'S TRUSTEE v. SELLAR. (a)

Costs—Taxation—Costs after threat of proceedings.

A letter threatening an action was written by the plaintiff's solicitors on the 3rd March 1903. The defendant on the 20th March 1903 obtained a transcript of the speeches, evidence, and judgment of actions against other defendants in which the fraud, to which it was alleged the defendant was a party, was disclosed. The writ was issued on the 16th April 1903. The action was dismissed for want of prosecution. The taxing master had allowed the costs of the transcript.

Held, that the matter must be referred back to the master, with a direction to allow only the costs of so much of the transcript of the evidence and judgment as related to the question whether the defendant was or was not party or privy to the fraud disclosed in the former actions.

SUMMONS by the plaintiff to review taxation. The main question raised was whether the costs of the transcript of the shorthand-writer's notes of the proceedings in an action brought by the same plaintiff against a different defendant, amounting to the sum of 61l., ought to be allowed on taxation to the defendant in the present action under the circumstances stated in the judgment. The taxing master had allowed the costs, and the plaintiff now sought to have them disallowed.

Peterson for the plaintiff.—The taxing master has allowed the costs of shorthand notes of the two actions brought by the plaintiff against the South American Electric Company Limited and Bright's Light and Power Limited. These costs were incurred before the writ was issued, and ought to be disallowed. A great deal of the evidence had nothing to do with the present defendant.

Eve, K.C. and Van Neck for the defendant.—The costs were incurred after the plaintiff had threatened to take proceedings. It was absolutely necessary for the defendant to ascertain what had taken place in the former actions. Until he obtained a transcript of the whole proceedings it was impossible to ascertain what part was material.

EADY, J.—This is a summons by the plaintiff to review taxation. The items objected to are an allowance of 61l., paid for a transcript of the whole of the proceedings, including speeches of counsel, in another action, and certain consequential allowances—namely, a fee of 14l. 15s. for the solicitor perusing the transcript and making notes of it for counsel, and a fee of five guineas to counsel for perusing it. The transcript is 1830 folios in length. The writ in the present action was issued on the 16th April 1903, statement of claim delivered on the 15th May 1903, and defence on the 15th June 1903. No further proceedings were taken in the action, and on the 9th Nov. 1903 an order was made dismissing the action for want of prosecution. The defendant's costs, as taxed, were allowed at 100l. 13s. 5d., including the items in dispute. Although the transcript is entered in the bill of costs as having been obtained in May 1903, it is not disputed that it was really bespoken on the 20th March 1903, and obtained on the 26th March, just three weeks before the issue of the writ in this action. It was, however, bespoken after a letter threatening this action had been received by the defendant on the 3rd March 1903. In the previous action—Bright's Trustee v. South American Electric Company Limited and Bright's Light and Power Limited, 1902, B., 2558—the plaintiff established that transfers of 21,800 out of 22,000 shares in Bright's Light and Power Limited were fraudulent and void under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, being made with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud the creditors of Charles Bright, the bankrupt. The defendant, Norrie Sellar, was not a party to that action, but 4000 of the shares in question were at one time standing in his name. The plaintiff in the present action sought to recover damages against Norrie Sellar for the loss sustained by the bankrupt's estate by reason of the fraudulent dealings with the shares, and alleged that the defendant was party or privy to the fraud of Charles Bright. The defendant in his defence did not admit that any fraud had been committed, and denied that he was party or privy to it, and said that with regard to the 4000 shares formerly standing in his name (part of the 21,800) he transferred them at the request of Charles Bright, but certainly without any intention to defeat Bright's creditors, and without knowledge of any such intention on the part of Charles Bright. It will thus be seen that the only case alleged against Norrie Sellar was being party or privy to a fraud by Bright. A letter threatening an action was written by the plaintiff's solicitors to the defendant on the 3rd March 1903. In this letter the plaintiff's solicitors state that they have been consulted "with reference to your conduct in fraudulently assisting the bankrupt to transfer and conceal the whole of his assets for the purpose of defeating his creditors." The defendant's contention is that it was in consequence of this letter that the transcript was bespoken, and preparations made for defending the action so threatened. The transcript is in four volumes and has been produced to me, and I have refreshed my recollection of the action, which was tried before me, by looking through it. Of vol. 1 ninety-two pages, of vol. 2 fifty-six pages, and of vol. 4 ninety-six pages consist of the speeches of counsel. The rest of vols. 1 and 2 and the whole of vol. 3 consist of evidence. The rest of vol. 4 consists of the judgment. Under these circumstances, and having regard to the nature and course of that action, it seemed to me that it was impossible to consider that the great expense incurred in obtaining this transcript and consequent thereon was "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party" in the present action. I thought that the master must have been under some misapprehension in allowing it, and accordingly I determined to see him upon the matter before disposing of this summons. An interview with the master has shown that this view was correct. He tells me that the transcript was not produced to him, and that no opportunity was afforded him of seeing the document, the costs of which he was allowing, and that if the matter is sent back to him he will only allow so much of the evidence and judgment as relates to the question whether the defendant was or was not party or privy to the fraud—that is, whether the defendant Sellar did or did not by any conduct of his assist the bankrupt to transfer or conceal any part of the assets for the purpose of defeating the bankrupt's creditors. In my judgment the defendant Sellar ought not to be allowed any greater amount than this, and accordingly I allow the summons and refer the matter back to the master with a direction to allow only the costs of so much of the transcript of the evidence and judgment as relates to the question whether the defendant Sellar was or was not party or privy to the fraud of Charles Bright—that is, whether the defendant Sellar did or did not by any conduct of his assist the bankrupt to transfer or conceal any part of the assets for the purpose of defeating the bankrupt's creditors. The two other items will be proportionately reduced. The defendant is to pay the costs of this application, and the costs will be taxed and set off against any sum payable by the plaintiff to defendant.

Re PERROTT AND KING'S CONTRACT. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Power of sale—Will—Executor—Constructive trustees.

A testatrix by her will dated the 3rd March 1849 appointed R. J. and U. M. executors, and gave them powers to apply income in maintenance and to sell certain hereditaments after the death of the survivors of her daughters.

The testatrix died on the 25th Dec. 1850. R. J. alone proved the will and died, leaving J. W. and M. W. his executors.

In 1873 a petition was presented by all parties beneficially interested, and new trustees of the will were appointed under the Trustee Act 1850.

After the death of the survivor of the daughters the trustees contracted to sell the hereditaments. The purchaser required the concurrence of the beneficiaries.

Held, that the concurrence of the beneficiaries could not be required.

VENDOR and purchaser summons.

A testatrix by her will dated the 3rd March 1849 appointed R. Joyning and U. Macey executors, and empowered her said trustees with the consent in writing of her daughters during their lives and afterwards at their discretion to demise hereditaments.

At the death of the survivor of her daughters she empowered her executors to sell the hereditaments.

The testatrix died on the 25th Dec. 1850. R. Joyning alone proved the will and died, having made a will, the executors of which were Jane Wood and Mary Wood.

In 1873 a petition was presented under the Trustee Act 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60) by all the persons beneficially entitled to the estate. The petition alleged that R. Joyning and U. Macey were constructive trustees, that Jane Wood and Mary Wood had never acted, and desired to be relieved of the trusts of the will.

On the 25th July 1873 Malins, V.C. made an order: "This court being of opinion that R. Joyning and U. Macey are trustees of the will of the testatrix within the meaning of the Trustee Act 1850, and that it is expedient to appoint new trustees of the will and impracticable so to do without the assistance of the court," and vested the hereditaments in new trustees thereby appointed.

After the death of the survivor of the daughters the trustees contracted to sell the hereditaments.

The purchaser objected that the power was given to the executors, and said that the trustees could not make a title without the concurrence of the beneficiaries.

Gatey for the vendors.—Malins, V.C. has declared that the executors are in fact trustees. Trustees appointed by the court have the same powers as the persons originally appointed by the will. The Conveyancing Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 70, prevents the purchaser from going behind the order.

Johnston for the purchaser.—The power was given to the executors, and can only be exercised by persons holding the office of executor:

Brown v. Burdett, 60 L. T. Rep. 520; 40 Ch. Div. 244;

Re Smith (1904) 1 Ch. 139.

Re Willing, W. N. 1890, 1.

EADY, J. (after stating the facts) said:—Powers are given to persons named executors in the will to do certain things; for instance, to apply income in maintenance, to sell the hereditaments after the death of the two daughters, to execute a conveyance, &c. An attempt has been made to say that the true construction is that the executors were not trustees. I am of opinion that it is not open to me to depart from the order made thirty years ago that the executors were trustees. The appointment of new trustees following on a declaration that the persons originally named were trustees within the meaning of the Act ought now to be acted upon. The persons appointed have all the powers of the persons originally named, including the power of sale. It is not necessary to get the concurrence of the beneficiaries at whose instigation these trustees were appointed.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

HENNIKER v. HOWARD. (a)

Trespass—Ditch and fence—Presumption of ownership—Acts of ownership—Rebuttal of presumption.The plaintiff and defendant were adjoining owners of land, the lands being bounded by a bank with a fence, with a ditch on the defendant's side.For nearly fifty years the defendant had trimmed the fence, pollarded the trees, and cleaned the ditch, but there was no evidence of knowledge on the part of the plaintiff.Held, that these acts of ownership did not rebut the presumption that the bank and fence were the property of the plaintiff.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Eardley Wilmot sitting at the Ipswich County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting certain trees in a fence.

These trees and the fence stood on a bank, the ditch of which was on the defendant's side. The bank and fence stood next to the plaintiff's land, and therefore prima facie belonged to him.

For nearly fifty years the defendant had trimmed the fence and pollarded the trees and cleaned the ditch.

It was alleged, and there was some evidence, that in 1862, four years after the defendant entered into possession, that the plaintiff's tenant, pointing to an ash tree in the fence, said: "I should like to put an 'eye' through that ash tree."

The then agent to the plaintiff, it was alleged, was called in consultation on the dispute, and agreed that the defendant was right and that the fence was his, but the defendant admitted that, so far as he knew, the plaintiff knew nothing about this.

With regard to the cutting of trees there was no substantial evidence.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the broad ground that he, for over half a century, exercised acts of ownership over the fence, acquiesced in and not interfered with, without placing much reliance on the defendant's evidence as to the conversation with the agent in 1862, which might not be evidence, or upon the evidence of the maps. He based his judgment on the broad acts of ownership, and stated that, as here there had been acts of ownership, he could not help if these acts had not been brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff's tenants thought that the defendant was wrong in doing what he did, they would have brought it to the notice of the plaintiffs. The evidence of the acts of ownership was to his mind sufficient to rebut the presumption that the fence and ditch went together.

The plaintiff appealed.

Stewart for the plaintiff.

North for the defendant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I have really felt great difficulty in this case, and, but for the decision in Earl of Craven v. Pridmore (18 Times L. Rep.

282), I should have thought we were not entitled to interfere with the finding of the County Court judge, because it must be remembered that in this court, dealing with County Court appeals, we have not got the power of the Court of Appeal dealing with the case of a judge sitting alone in the High Court, as we often have to point out. We have no right to review findings of fact, and, if there was any evidence on which the learned judge could come to the conclusion which could in any way support his finding of fact, we may not overrule him. If the decision in Earl of Craven v. Pridmore (sup.) had been a decision by the Court of Appeal that on the weight of evidence—as a rehearing—they thought Ridley, J. (17 Times L. Rep. 399) had come to a wrong conclusion, it would not have been an authority to the extent to which I think it is. But I certainly read the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, concurred in by Romer and Mathew, L.JJ., as holding that the evidence therein referred to was of such a shadowy and neutral character as not sufficient to displace the presumption, meaning that it ought not to be regarded by a lawyer as being evidence of a character which would displace the presumption, and, further, that the alleged acts of ownership were easily explicable without the necessity for drawing the inference that the property in the fences was in the defendants or their lessor. In that case there had been evidence of the clipping of the hedge and of the lopping of trees for a much longer period, and of some other acts which were not in this case. Therefore I think I had better state what I understand the sum and substance of the evidence is apart from this question of the map, which I think when examined has very little to do with the case. I gather that the real evidence is that which Mr. North very frankly and fairly stated. The real evidence is continuous or almost continuous—I will say constant—clipping of the hedge and pollarding of some of the trees for many years. With regard to the cutting down of the trees, there does not seem to be any substantial evidence or any evidence of cutting down trees in the ordinary sense of the word. There is some evidence of one tree being cut forty years before, and then evidence of two trees being cut which gave rise to this dispute. Therefore there is only evidence of one tree being cut which could be fairly treated as being evidence of an act of ownership acquiesced in by anybody. With the observations which have been made by my brother I entirely concur, in that many of these acts may be done, or allowed to be done, without any admission, and that applies very strongly to a clipping of hedges or pollarding pollard trees in a hedge. It must be remembered that there certainly is no evidence here of knowledge by Lord Henniker or his agents of what the defendant was doing, and if it be true, as Mr. North says, that this is an outlying part of Lord Henniker's estate, and that it is not one which has been brought before his notice, or much before that of his agents, that observation would, of course, be strengthened. I therefore come to the conclusion that the Court of Appeal in Earl of Craven v. Pridmore (sup.) have said that where you have got the original strong presumption of a ditch made, the earth thrown back, and a hedge placed upon the side of the ditch next to the man's land who has made the ditch, with these acts of clipping the hedges and dealing with the cutting and lopping of the trees not brought to the knowledge of the owner, those acts of ownership are not that class of evidence which can be held to be properly admissible for rebutting the presumption. They are, as the Master of the Rolls calls it, evidence of a shadowy and neutral character, and not sufficient to displace the presumption. I think we should not be doing our duty in following the Court of Appeal, as we are bound to do in such cases, if we were to draw the distinction in this case that there was some evidence to go to the learned County Court judge on which he could come to the conclusion which he did. I would only say one word with regard to the map. It is obvious it cannot be used a document in favour of the defendant as against Lord Henniker, because it is not the defendant's own deed, but it might possibly have been of some service if it had been connected with some definite act of Lord Henniker or his agents, and thereby brought within the rule about the declaration of servants or agents in the course of their duty. I do not think it is so. In the first place, with regard to part of the locus in quo, it distinctly says the hedge is not the defendant's. I think the County Court judge was right in disregarding—as an important factor in this case—both the deed and Preston's statement, and in holding that there was not enough in the evidence proved with regard to the document or the conversation to make them admissible. With regard to the other point, I think he was bound and we are bound by the decision in Earl of Craven v. Pridmore, and he ought to have held that there was no evidence on which he could properly come to the conclusion that the presumption was rebutted. I think the appeal should be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I feel the difficulty which my Lord has indicated as to the exact ground to be taken in a case of this kind in dealing with the case for the purpose of seeing whether—although there are some facts—a lawyer, who has to look at the matter from a legal point of view, is justified in giving that evidence any weight as against an established or admitted state of things creating the presumption which is admitted in this case. As I read the report which has been before me of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Earl of Craven v. Pridmore, which is binding upon us, in substance it is a decision, not that there was no evidence of acts of ownership, but that, as the Master of the Rolls says, there was evidence, but that it “seemed to him to be of a very shadowy and neutral character, and not sufficient to displace the presumption.” There is no doubt there were certain facts there proved which were the evidence referred to by his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, and I think, when he said that they were not sufficient to displace the presumption, he was not merely meaning that on the balance of evidence they came to the conclusion that there was such an overwhelming weight of evidence on one side that the learned judge below, whom they were entitled to overrule on that ground, had gone wrong and had taken a view which had some evidence to support it, but so little that his judgment was against the weight of evidence, but I think they are saying: “Here you have a recognised legal presumption; before that presumption can, as a matter of law, be properly overruled in a court of this country, there must be more evidence than is afforded by acts of the character and nature that are proved before us in this case.” Now, what were the acts in that case, and what was their character? There was very strong evidence, indeed, in a sense—when I say strong, I mean evidence which, according to the report, seems to have been unshaken—both of the lopping and the cutting and laying of fences and the repairs of fences whenever needed since the year 1856 in regard to one portion of the land, and 1875 as regards another portion. Not only so, but it was proved that the defendant had, in that case, cut trees in the fence as far back as thirty-one years ago and sold them; that in 1887 another tree was cut in the same fence; and in 1895, when a tree was blown down in the fence and actually lay on the plaintiff's land for two years, Pridmore, the defendant, sold the tree, and the timber merchants removed it from the plaintiff's own land. I confess that if the view which I hope we are both right in taking of the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, they were taking that view on evidence which I confess, speaking for myself, as far as regards acts of ownership, is much stronger than any evidence in this case, because what happened here was merely a repairing of the fence, which in certain cases may not be jealously watched. On the other hand, it must largely depend upon the character of the adjoining tenant and his relations with his neighbour and whether the neighbour is going to found a right on his being allowed to lop. It must depend on circumstances, but it is quite explicable. But if as is said on behalf of the person who is pleading against the presumption, “Do you think that unless I believed it to be mine I should go to the expense of lopping it and trimming it?” On the other side it may be said: “Very well, if that is a substantial matter, is not it the very thing which in many cases, at any rate, the adjoining tenant would be only too glad to see done at the expense of his neighbour rather than his own?” Besides that which my Lord has referred to, there is in this case, I might also call it so isolated as to be shadowy, evidence of cutting trees, and a statement as to a dispute which is only valuable in so far as it is sought to bring in by it an admission of an agent of Lord Henniker. I do not, speaking for myself, think that it ought to be treated as an admission, technically, but I certainly should attach no value to it. What happened is that a person who was the agent, when two neighbours are disputing, no doubt, as to the right to interfere with the tree in the fence, is said to have given his opinion one way. I do not think that ought to constitute an admission. At the most the value of that admission could only be got at by ascertaining to what extent the dispute was gone into on the merits, and was not treated as a friendly settlement. I am afraid of admissions always, and certainly when they are made by persons who are not those immediately concerned, but their servants or agents. When you have said that, the only thing left is the map. As regards maps, I think it may be fairly said that at most they cut both ways. If the map upon which stress is laid shows in one portion of it something that favours the defendant, on the other hand it shows something which favours the plaintiff. I think it is better to leave the map out altogether, but certainly it does not materially, as it appears to me, improve the case as regards the whole of this line of fence for the defendant; it would only improve it as regards part, if at all. Then, if used at all in regard to the whole of the contention, it seems to me it cannot be treated except as being certainly neutral evidence, to borrow one word in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. In my opinion, following loyally, as one is bound to do, that decision, we have no alternative but to allow this appeal.

Principal and agent—Commission—"When and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."

The defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff commission on the sale of an hotel "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."

The plaintiff introduced a purchaser, who signed a contract to purchase with the defendant, and paid a deposit.

The purchaser was unable to carry out the contract, and the defendant agreed to release her and he was to retain the deposit.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his commission.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Austin sitting at the Bristol County Court.

In June 1902 the defendant had on his hands the Full Moon Hotel for sale.

He gave particulars to the plaintiff, who knew of a likely purchaser and communicated with her.

On the 8th Sept. the defendant gave the following commission note to the plaintiff:

If your friend is named and introduced within one week and becomes the purchaser of the above hotel, you shall be paid as and by way of commission a sum of 50*l.* when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty.

The plaintiff then introduced the lady to the defendant, and on the 11th Sept. she signed a contract with the defendant agreeing to purchase the hotel for 2000*l.*, and she paid to the defendant 200*l.* as deposit.

She was unable to carry out the contract, and it was agreed between her and the defendant that he should retain the 200*l.* deposit and should release her from the contract, and this was accordingly done.

Thereupon the plaintiff brought the present action to recover his commission.

The learned County Court judge was of opinion that, in construing the commission note of the 8th Sept. 1902, he was bound to give some effect to the words, "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty," and that, inasmuch as the purchase never was completed in the ordinary meaning of the word and inasmuch as the purchase went off through no default of the vendor, the plaintiff was not entitled to his commission.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hawke for the plaintiff.—The learned County Court judge was wrong in his construction of the commission note. What it means is that if the plaintiff finds a purchaser by private treaty and the negotiation results in a contract, then the plaintiff is to be paid his commission. The word "completion" is not used in its technical sense of handing over the money and signing the deeds, but completion so far as the plaintiff is concerned means finding a purchaser who is ready and willing to contract and does in fact contract and who is accepted by the vendor. All these conditions were fulfilled by the plaintiff, who obtained a contract for the vendor, and the vendor in fact received the deposit. It can make no difference to the right of the plaintiff to recover commission that the vendor has let the purchaser off her contract. He referred to

Grogan v. Smith, 6 Times L. Rep. 427; 7 Times L. Rep. 132;

Brooke Little for the defendant.—Some meaning must be attached to the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty," and the only meaning to be applied is that the purchase must be completed in the ordinary legal meaning of those words by paying over the money and signing the deeds or documents. Here the purchaser found by the plaintiff was unable to complete, and the learned County Court judge was right in holding that the plaintiff had not earned his commission.

WILLS, J.—The point here is a short one, but one of some difficulty, because the words are not as clear as they might be, and I can quite conceive two persons coming to opposite conclusions as to their meaning. But I think when they are carefully considered their real meaning is tolerably obvious, and it is not the meaning attached to them by the learned County Court judge. It is a good general rule that, unless you are driven to a contrary conclusion, you should construe words according to their grammatical meaning. Now, the words "private treaty" attach to the word "completed," and the plaintiff is to be entitled to his commission when the purchase is completed in a particular way, and that particular way is by private treaty. If "completion" means completion in the ordinary legal sense—that is, by the execution of the conveyance and the paying over of the balance of the purchase money—then there is no meaning in the words "private treaty" as attached to the word "completed." I think the words "by private treaty" are meant to exclude by auction. Mr. Brooke Little's contention requires more violence of construction than the one which I have adopted. I think the word "completed" is used in its grammatical meaning and not in its technical meaning, and I think the parties in using the word "completion" did not mean it in this latter sense. I think the purchase was completed and effected by private treaty, for if the vendor by the contract is bound to sell, and the purchaser is bound to buy and the purchaser is accepted by the vendor, then the purchase is effected and completed so far as the agent is concerned. That construction does less violence to the use of the language than that suggested by the defendant.

K.B. Div.] LEWIN AND OTHERS v. NEWNES LIMITED; SAME v. WARNE AND CO. [K.B. Div.]

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I do not see any answer to the reasonable meaning placed on these words by my brother Wills. I do not think it is fair to take the words out of their order and to read them as "when and if the purchase by private treaty is completed." It would have been so easy to have said that if the parties had intended it. The purchase was effectually completed by private treaty when a valid legal contract was obtained.

Rating — House — Occupation — Caretaker — 51 Geo. 3, c. 150.

By 51 Geo. 3, c. 150, after reciting an Act of 12 Car. 2, c. 37, whereby a yearly sum of 250l. was charged upon the houses of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, for the support and benefit of the rector, curate, clerk, and sextons for the time being of that parish, that charge of 250l. was repealed, and in lieu thereof a yearly sum of 520l. was charged upon all houses within the said parish to be assessed by the churchwardens and paid by the occupiers of such houses respectively.

Held, that houses consisting of the offices, warehouses, store-rooms, and counting-houses of publishers, some rooms in which were occupied by caretakers and their families, such caretakers having internal access to the whole of the premises, were chargeable under this statute.

Surman v. Darley (14 M. & W. 181) considered.

APPEALS from His Honour Judge Woodfall sitting at the Westminster County Court.

Two actions were brought by the churchwardens of the parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, to recover rates alleged to be due to them under 51 Geo. 3, c. 150.

The premises upon which the rates were sought to be levied were, in the case of Newnes Limited, premises Nos. 8 to 11, Southampton-street, occupied by them, and the bulk of those premises, some forty rooms, were used for the purposes of their business as publishers for their offices and their warehouse.

These defendants set apart three rooms, and in those three rooms lived their caretaker and his wife.

In the case of Warne and Co. they occupied premises at No. 15, Bedford-street, and Nos. 2, 3, and 4, Bedford-court.

Those buildings were connected by iron doors, and the learned judge found, for the purposes of the action, that structurally they were one building, and the rooms consisted of store-rooms, offices, and counting-house.

All the premises were connected internally, and the caretakers had access to the whole of the buildings by means of internal communications.

The learned County Court judge, after stating the facts, delivered the following judgment:

The defence is that the house must be a dwelling-house, and the only definition of the houses which are actually subject to this rate is to be found in the case of Surman v. Darley (14 M. & W. 181). It is to be observed that in that case the question is whether a building in the nature of a theatre could be made subject to a rate under this Act. It was decided that it could not, and, in so deciding the case, the court gave a definition of what buildings were liable to rates under this Act, and it is upon that definition that the defendants rely. Pollock, C.B. said: "It seems to me that this Act was intended to apply only to dwelling-houses occupied by individuals as such, and that such buildings as warehouses and counting-houses were not included in it." The other judgments are to the same effect, and that judgment is prayed in aid by both the defendants. In my opinion those decisions will not help the defendants. All the judges there say is—Alderson, B. in particular—that the houses liable to the rate are "dwelling-houses, or, at all events, those which are capable of being occupied as such." These houses are occupied as such. It is quite true that it is only a small portion of them which is set aside as the dwelling-place of these people; but they are occupied as dwelling-houses, and it seems to me that is the answer. Is the house capable of being occupied as a dwelling-house? The answer is that it is occupied as a dwelling-house. It seems to me that it is impossible to say that these premises of both of these defendants are not capable of being occupied as dwelling-houses, because in fact they are so occupied. The second defence upon which the defendants rely is a judgment of Lord Herschell, delivered in the case of Russell v. Town and County Bank (59 L. T. Rep. 481; 13 App. Cas. 418). That was a judgment dealing entirely with what building was entitled to exemption under the Income Tax Act. Mr. Mears referred me to a dictum of Lord Herschell's, reported at p. 427, in which the noble and learned Lord says: "I do not think the word 'dwelling-house' is here used in any such sense, and that a bank or a manufactory or a warehouse becomes a dwelling-house because some servant of the trader resides in that building for the purposes of the trade." Mr. Mears asks me to read that proposition from the words "and that a bank or manufactory or warehouse becomes a dwelling-house because some servant of the trader resides in the building for the purposes of the trade." Of course, if Lord Herschell was there going to lay down a definition of a dwelling-house which was to be applied under any circumstances, to lay it down as an authoritative proposition with all the authority of the House of Lords, that is a conclusion of this case; but I do not think his Lordship meant that at all. I think that his whole sentence must be read. He says: "I do not think the word 'dwelling-house' is here used," and I think that what he said there must be taken to apply only to the point which he was then deciding, and that it would be putting a very much more extended meaning on his words to hold that that is a definition under all circumstances and under any act of what shall or shall not constitute a dwelling-house. The defendants rely again on the fact that these premises are exempted from payment of the inhabited house duty; but there again, in considering a case under this Act of 51 Geo. 3, I think that a different reasoning applies to the case of Russell v. Town and County Bank (sup.) and to the considerations which exempt a building from the inhabited house duty. Different considerations apply. Fiscal and other considerations arise in determining what is the liability under the Revenue Act. I think that when one looks at what is the intention of this Act of 51 Geo. 3 (which extended the Act of Charles II.), one sees at once that an entirely different train of thought arises, and entirely different considerations apply. The intention of these Acts was to provide spiritual benefit for the persons who dwell in the parish. As Alderson, B. said in the case of Surman v. Darley (sup.), the first Act is a key to the second, and shows that the parties who were to be liable to the rate were those who would derive benefit from the services of the rector, curate, clerk, and sexton. Who are these people? The caretakers and their families. That is to say, the servants of the defendants. The defendants occupy these premises as dwelling-houses for their servants. Mr. Mears took a further point. He said that if that is so, then it is the servants who are liable to the rate, and not the persons who do not in fact dwell in the parish; but there again I do not think that the argument can be maintained, because, if one looks at sect. 9 of the Act of George III., it clearly contemplated that someone who does not himself live in the parish, but who lives outside, may still be liable to the rate, because his house is occupied as a dwelling-house. It is his house, and he himself occupies it as a dwelling-house, although he does not himself actually live there. It seems to me that that really exhausts the subject, and I can only find that the defendants by their servants occupy these houses as dwelling-houses, and consequently they are liable to pay this rate.

It was provided by 51 Geo. 3, c. 150:

Whereas an Act was passed in the twelfth year of the reign of His late Majesty King Charles II., intituled "An Act for making the Precinct of Covent Garden parochial," whereby it was, amongst other things, enacted that the yearly sum of 250*l.* should from thenceforth be and the same was thereby charged upon the houses of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the county of Middlesex (except the house then commonly called Bedford House, with the appurtenances), for the support and benefit of the rector, curate, clerk, and sextons for the time being of the said parish: And whereas from the very great advance in price of the articles of necessary consumption, it is expedient that the said sum of 250*l.* should be increased: May it therefore please your Majesty that it may be enacted and be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this Act the said charge of 250*l.* shall cease and determine, and that all and every the clauses, powers, and provisions in the said Act contained so far as the same respect the assessing and compelling payment of the said sum of 250*l.* (except as to any arrears of the same sum which shall at or before the passing of this Act have become due and payable) shall and the same are hereby repealed and declared to be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

II. And be it further enacted that in lieu of the said sum of 250*l.* the yearly sum of 520*l.* shall from the 25th March next before the passing of this Act be and the same is hereby charged upon all houses within the said parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, and shall within fourteen days next after the passing of this Act and for ever after yearly, on the 25th March or within thirty-one days after in every year, be assessed and rated by the churchwardens of the said parish or any two of them after a pound rate, according to the fair yearly rent or improved value of such a house respectively; and every such rate or assessment shall be confirmed and allowed by and under the hands and seals of two of His Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex or city of Westminster; and all such rates and assessments shall be borne and paid by the respective occupiers of such houses respectively and shall be paid to and be collected by such person or persons as they the said churchwardens or any two of them shall from time to time appoint by quarterly payments on the 24th June, the 29th day of Sept., the 25th of Dec., and the 25th March in each and every year; all which moneys to be collected by such rates and assessments so to be made as aforesaid shall and are hereby declared to be vested in the said churchwardens in trust to be applied by them for the purposes of this Act, and the said rates and assessments shall commence and take place from the said 25th day of March last. Provided always that it shall be lawful for the said churchwardens or any two of them and they are hereby required from time to time in making any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act to assess and raise in addition to and in the same manner in every respect as the said sum of 520*l.* as much money as may be necessary for defraying the reasonable expenses of making and collecting every such rate or assessment and for making good any loss or deficiency which shall then have arisen from the insolvency of any collector or collectors of the said rates or otherwise: Provided also and be it further enacted that it shall be lawful for the said churchwardens and they are hereby required in making out any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act to exclude out of the same such house as at the time of making such rate or assessment shall be actually occupied by the rector of the said parish for the time being.

Grimwood Mears for the appellants. — These premises are not liable to be rated. It was held in Surman v. Darley (14 M. & W. 181) that the word "houses" in this statute meant houses intended for human habitation, and Pollock, C.B. says: "We all think that the word 'house' prima facie means a dwelling-house." Rolfe, B. says the same. He referred to

51 Geo. 3, c. 150, ss. 1, 2.

This last Act, which repealed the former one, does not include in the word "houses" strictly business premises which have a caretaker on them. The fact of dwelling is purely personal, and only the persons who dwell within the parish and so enjoy the benefits of the rector, curate, clerk, and sextons are made liable to this rate by the statute. Surman v. Darley (sup.) shows that the statute was only intended to apply to individuals occupying a dwelling-house as such. He referred to Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15, s. 13;

Grant v. Langston, 82 L. T. Rep. 629; (1900) A. C. 389.

Clarke Hall (Ernest H. Pooley with him) for the respondents. — If these premises would be liable to inhabited house duty apart from the exemption in sect. 13 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1879, they would certainly be liable to this rate. If they had not been considered liable before 1879, there would have been no necessity for inserting the exemption. These premises are used as dwelling-houses and are capable of being used as such, which is very different from the case of a theatre as in Surman v. Darley (sup.). London and Westminster Bank v. Smith (sup.) turned on the point that the bank manager was not a caretaker, and so the case was not within the exemption of sect. 13 of the Act of 1879. The intercommunication makes the whole of the premises one occupation, and the whole premises are liable.

Mears in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

K.B. DIV.] LEWIN AND OTHERS v. NEWNES LIMITED; SAME v. WARNE AND CO. [K.B. DIV.]

Feb. 1.—KENNEDY, J. read the following written judgment of the court:—This is an appeal from the judgment of the learned judge of the Westminster County Court in the case of Lewin and others v. Newnes Limited. He held that the appellants, who occupy Nos. 8, 9, 10, and 11, Southampton-street, Covent Garden, are liable to the rector's rate in respect of those premises under the statute 12 Car. 2 and the amending statute 51 Geo. 3, c. 150. The premises comprise altogether forty rooms, and are used by the appellants chiefly as a store and counting-house in their business as publishers. They are connected internally. Three rooms are used for the residence by day and night of a servant of the defendants and his wife, who act as caretakers and who have access to the whole building by means of internal communication. The statute 12 Car. 2, c. 10, s. 3, directs the rate to be assessed upon the inhabitants of the parish according to the improved value of the yearly rent of the respective houses of such inhabitants. Sect. 2 of the amending Act says that the sum charged (520l.) is thereby charged upon all houses within the parish, and all the rates and assessments "shall be borne and paid by the occupiers of such houses." There is no doubt that the appellants are the occupiers of these premises; the principal ground of this appeal is that the premises do not constitute a "house" within the meaning of the statutes. In Surman v. Darley (14 M. & W. 181) the judges of the Court of Exchequer, in the year 1845, had to deal with a similar question under the same statutes. They had to decide whether or not the proprietors in possession of the Covent Garden Theatre were liable to the rector's rate. Obviously the theatre was not designed or built for inhabitancy or for the purposes of a dwelling-house. No person slept or resided in it. The court held that it was not liable to assessment. The judges (Pollock, C.B., Alderson, Rolfe, and Platt, BB.) were all of opinion that the term "house" prima facie means a dwelling-house; and the effect of the judgment is that, according to the true meaning of these enactments, the rector's rate is imposed only upon houses occupied as dwelling-houses, or, at all events, on those houses which are capable of being occupied as dwelling-houses. The Covent Garden Theatre plainly did not satisfy this test of rateability; but, in our opinion, as in that of the learned County Court judge, the premises in question do. They were built as dwelling-houses. They are capable, so far as structure is concerned, of being inhabited or occupied as dwelling-houses, and they are dwelt in night and day by the respondents' servant and his wife, who have access to every part of the building, which is internally connected throughout and must be treated as one. We are of opinion that our decision does not in any way conflict with any of the judgments cited from cases which have been decided under the provisions of the statutes relating to the duties on inhabited houses. In Grant v. Langston (82 L. T. Rep. 629; (1900) A. C. 389), a case under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15), the decision hinged upon the conclusion of the House of Lords on the facts of the particular case, that the ground floor of a house of two stories was so completely divided and separated from the upper floor, which was used as a dwelling, as to constitute in itself a house or tenement which was occupied solely for the purposes of a trade or business, and therefore was exempt from duty under sect. 13 (2) of that statute. In the present case no question of the division of the building into separate houses or tenements by structural severance arises. The learned counsel for the appellants referred also to a sentence in the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in London and Westminster Bank v. Smith (87 L. T. Rep. 244, at p. 245). This, too, was a case under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15). There the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal, held that the bank failed to bring itself within the exemption of sect. 13 (1). The third and fourth floors of a building were used as residences by the bank manager; and in the course of his judgment (p. 245) Lord Macnaghten said: "There is no ground that I can see on which the bank can claim exemption. The bank manager is not a caretaker. The case is the ordinary case of a person using part of his house as a residence and part as his place of business." The reasoning of this passage does not touch the present case. It is reasoning used to show that, inasmuch as the resident was a bank manager and not a caretaker, the bank was not in a position to rely upon the comparatively modern legislation in regard to inhabited house duties, which, in giving exemption to warehouse or office premises from assessment, has enacted expressly that the residence there of a mere caretaker shall not destroy the exemption. It is not reasoning which affects the value of the fact of the dwelling of a caretaker in premises, when the question is as to the propriety of treating those premises as a house within the meaning of the two statutes which govern the present case, as those statutes are, in respect of the word "house," interpreted by the Court of Exchequer in Surman v. Darley (sup.). It appears to us that a similar remark is applicable to the use which was sought to be made by the learned counsel for the appellants, both in the County Court and before us, of language which Lord Herschell is reported to have employed in the course of his judgment in Russell v. Town and County Bank (59 L. T. Rep. 481; 13 App. Cas. 418, at p. 427). We agree with the learned County Court judge when he points out that Lord Herschell was plainly expressing his opinion only as to the meaning of the term "dwelling-house" as used in the particular Act of Parliament—the Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, sched. D). Lord Herschell is stating his dissent from the conclusion that, because the bank's business building contained living rooms for the bank manager, the deduction which the income tax allows for the rent or value of such parts of a dwelling-house as may be used for trade purposes could not be made in respect of any part of the building. We can see no authority in Lord Herschell's language for this court holding in the present case that, under statutes which are not passed for fiscal purposes, but are passed in order to make provision for the spiritual wants of the dwellers in a parish by a rate levied on the occupiers of all houses within the parish which are capable of being used as dwelling-houses, a building may not properly be treated as a dwelling-house, although the larger part of the building is used for the time being for the purposes of trade or business, if, in fact, the whole of the building is capable of being used as a dwelling-house and persons, whether caretakers or others, do, in fact, dwell in part of it. One other argument was addressed by the appellants to the County Court judge and also, though not with much insistence, to us. That was that, if any persons are to be rated, it should be the caretaker. We are clearly of opinion, that as the occupation of the caretaker is the occupation of a servant for and in the service of his employers, the appellants, it is they and not he who must, for rating purposes, be treated as occupiers. This appeal must be dismissed. It is agreed that there is no material distinction between the case of Lewin and others v. Warne and Co. and the preceding case, and therefore this appeal fails also. We do not think that it makes any difference that the rooms occupied by the caretaker and his wife are situated in the upper floor of one of several houses now internally connected and used as one.

Appeals dismissed.

RUBEN AND LADENBURG v. GREAT FINGALL CONSOLIDATED LIMITED AND OTHERS. (a)

Company—Forged share certificate—Issue by secretary—Liability of company—Estoppel.

A certificate of shares in a limited company was delivered by the secretary of such company at their offices, such certificate in form being perfectly regular. In fact the certificate was a forgery, and was made and delivered by the secretary acting fraudulently and not for or on behalf of or for the benefit of the company, but solely for himself and for his own private purposes and advantage.

Held, that the company were estopped from denying the title of the transferees of the shares, and that they were liable in damages for refusing to place the names of the transferees on their list of shareholders.

Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company Limited (50 L. T. Rep. 685; 13 Q. B. Div. 103) considered and followed.

ACTION brought by the plaintiffs to recover 20,149l. 11s. 9d. damages from the defendants under the following circumstances.

The statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the learned judge.

One A. S. Rowe, then a partner in Bewick, Moreing, and Co., was in Dec. 1902 the secretary of the defendant company. He held the appointment under a written agreement of the 31st Dec. 1900 between the defendant company and Bewick, Moreing, and Co., whereby Bewick, Moreing, and Co. undertook to provide the defendant company with suitable offices and office accommodation, a suitable secretary, to be approved of by the company, and a sufficient clerical staff. The secretary was to be paid by Bewick, Moreing, and Co., but was to be deemed to be the secretary and officer of the defendant company, and subject to dismissal by the defendant company at any time. Bewick, Moreing, and Co. were to receive 500l. a year from the defendant company, and also all transfer fees received by the defendant company.

The defendant company's registered office in Dec. 1902 was in the offices of Bewick, Moreing, and Co., No. 20, Copthall-avenue, E.C., and several other limited companies were housed and provided for by Bewick, Moreing, and Co. there under similar arrangements.

The plaintiffs are a firm of stockbrokers in the City, with whom Rowe had for some months before Dec. 1902 done business on his own private account in stocks and share transactions. They knew he was a partner in Bewick, Moreing, and Co. They did not know that he was secretary of the defendant company. They believed him to be a director of it. He had been introduced to the plaintiffs as a person in good credit, he kept his engagements, and they had every confidence in him.

With Mr. Lindo, one of the partners in the plaintiffs' firm, Rowe was on terms of social acquaintance.

In December Rowe saw Mr. Lindo and asked whether the plaintiffs could arrange a loan for him on 5000 shares in the defendant company. He said he had a joint account with a friend, who wished to sell, and he desired to take over the friend's interest, and so avoid a sale, because, on information which he had received, he believed the shares (which were then at a premium) would rise considerably in value. He wanted the loan for a short time only, and, as the 5000 shares afforded at the price of the day ample security for the 20,000l. which he wanted on loan, and he undertook, if there was any fall in price, to provide a 2l. per share margin, the plaintiffs agreed to try to meet his wishes.

On the 16th Dec. the plaintiffs arranged with Lazard Brothers and Co., bankers in the City, who have been made by the plaintiffs defendants in this action in order that all the parties might be before the court, for the advance of 20,000l. to themselves for a principal in the proposed security, and Mr. Lindo on the same day went to the offices of Bewick, Moreing, and Co., which were also the offices of the defendant company, and told Rowe that the money would be ready on the 18th Dec.

Rowe said that he would have the share transfer executed by the transferor on the following day. The shares, he said, were standing in the company's books in his friend's name, and not in his own.

On the 17th Dec. the transfer, with the names of the transferees, Rosenheim (a partner in the bank) and Alexandre, who appears as a formal defendant in this action, upon it, was taken by Lindo to Rowe, and later in the day it was returned by Rowe to Lindo, and purported to have been executed by "E. Storey" as transferor.

A shareholder of that name was called as a witness and deposed that he was interested at the time in 5000 shares in the company, but that he was the registered owner only of 2000.

In the corner of the document was the usual "certification."

Rowe, when he gave Lindo the transfer, said that his directors (that is, the directors of the defendant company) would be meeting the next day at 11 a.m., that he would explain everything to them, and have the share certificate made out in the names of Rosenheim and Alexandre, and that it would be ready for Lindo if he called at 11.30 a.m.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.] RUBEN & LADENBURG v. GREAT FINGALL CONSOLIDATED LIM., &C. [K.B. Div.]

The same afternoon Lindo brought back to Rowe the transfer executed by the transferees, paid to him the registration fee of 2s. 6d., and received a receipt in due form.

On the 18th Dec., at 11.30 a.m., at the office, Rowe delivered to Lindo the share certificate, and Lindo returned the receipt to Rowe.

The certificate thus issued was in form perfectly regular. It purported, in accordance with art. 12 of the articles of association of the defendant company, to bear the seal of the defendant company, to be signed by two of its directors, and to be countersigned by Rowe, as the defendant company's secretary. Lindo learnt from it for the first time that Rowe was the company's secretary.

The certificate was taken by Lindo to the plaintiffs' office, where it was examined by their clerk, and it was then taken by him to the office of Lazard Brothers and Co, where it was left after its examination by a clerk there, and their cheque for 20,000*l.* in favour of the plaintiffs was handed to Lindo.

This cheque was paid by the plaintiffs into their own banking account, and a cheque of the plaintiffs for the same amount, less stamp fee and commission, was handed over to Rowe the same day, and was subsequently cashed by him.

Within ten days Rowe absconded, and it was discovered that the certificate was a forgery. The only genuine part of it was Rowe's counter-signature as secretary. The signatures of the two directors, which it bore, were forged, and the seal of the company, which it also bore, had been fraudulently affixed to it by Rowe, who, as secretary, had access to it at all times, and practically the custody of it, in the safe of the defendant company.

Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., by their solicitors, applied to the defendant company for the registration of Rosenheim and Alexandre in the books of the defendant company as the owners of the shares.

The defendant company refused to accede to the application.

Then Lazard Brothers and Co. applied to the plaintiffs for other equivalent security or repayment of the loan of 20,000*l.*

The plaintiffs have paid Lazard Brothers and Co. the amount of the loan, with interest, and thereupon, as the defendant company refused to register the ownership of Rosenheim and Alexandre or recognise their title to the shares, they brought the present action, after obtaining from Lazard Brothers and Co. an assignment of that company's rights, if any, and giving written notice of such assignment to the defendant company.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed against the defendant company. They also claimed against Bewick, Moreing, and Co. as the partners of Rowe. Lazard Brothers and Co. and Rosenheim and Alexandre were defendants only in form.

The action came on for trial before the learned judge with a special jury.

Certain statements or admissions of material facts were agreed to by the counsel for the respective parties, which left, in the judgment of the learned judge, no question which it was necessary or proper to leave to the jury.

These statements or admissions of fact were as follows:

Agreed—(1) That the alleged certificate is not a valid or genuine document, and that the signatures thereon, other than the signature of Rowe, are forgeries; (2) (a) that the bank (Lazard Brothers and Co.) and the parties respectively made the advances upon the faith of the genuineness and validity of the alleged certificate and of its being properly issued, and (b) the secretary was a proper person to deliver it; (3) that Rowe, in creating and delivering to Lindo the alleged certificate, acted fraudulently and not for or on behalf of or for the benefit of the defendant company, and solely for himself and for his own private purposes and advantage; (4) that the defendant company did not by its directors or otherwise authorise Rowe to make, seal, or issue the alleged document; (5) that during the month of Dec. 1902, at all events, Rowe was a partner in the firm of Bewick, Moreing, and Co.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. and J. D. Crawford for the plaintiffs.—This case is covered by the decision of the Divisional Court in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company Limited (50 L. T. Rep. 685; 13 Q. B. Div. 103), where it was held that the company were estopped by the certificate issued by their secretary in the usual and authorised form from disputing the plaintiff's title to the shares. There the secretary was acting within the scope of his employment. That decision is in no way affected by British Mutual Banking Company Limited v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company (57 L. T. Rep. 833; 18 Q. B. Div. 714), for there the secretary was acting outside the scope of his authority, and the company could not be liable for untrue and fraudulent answers made by such secretary for his own ends as to the validity of certain debenture stock. In this case the secretary was acting within the scope of his authority, and the facts here constitute an estoppel. They referred to Balkis Consolidated Company v. Tomkinson, 69 L. T. Rep. 598; (1893) A. C. 396.

All the cases show that a company is bound by a certificate purporting to be issued in the usual and authorised form. It would be an impossibility to find out whether every signature and every act that had been done were in order. It is true that in Buckley on the Companies Acts, 8th edit., at p. 103, some doubt is thrown upon Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company Limited (sup.), but Palmer in his work on Company Precedents, 7th edit., at p. 17, thinks that the company would be liable where the seal was irregularly fixed, if the instrument appears to be in accordance with the regulations of the company. Where a company has registered a forged transfer or issued a false certificate the company are bound and are liable in damages to a person acting in good faith on the validity of the registration or the truth of the certificate and has thereby suffered damage. The present case is very different to George Whitechurch Limited v. Cavanagh (85 L. T. Rep. 349; (1902) A. C. 117), for the documents there were certifications of transfers of shares and clearly there was no estoppel, and to Hambro v. Burnand (89 L. T. Rep. 180; (1903) 2 K. B. 399). The facts admitted in this case show that the principles laid down in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company Limited apply, and that case has not been overruled by any subsequent decision. They also referred to County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Steam and House Coal Colliery Company, 72 L. T. Rep. 375; (1895) 1 Ch. 629.

Lawson Walton, K.C., Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Bremner for the defendants the Great Fingall Consolidated Limited.—A principal is not liable for the unauthorised or fraudulent act of a servant or agent committed not for the general or special benefit of the principal, but for the servant or agent's own private ends. They referred to

Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 16 L. T. Rep. 461; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 259;

British Mutual Banking Company Limited v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company (sup.).

The certificate being a forged document the company cannot make any representation by means of it, and so they are not estopped. Rowe acted for his own purposes, and so the company cannot be liable. They referred to Limpus v. London General Omnibus Company, 1 H. & C. 30.

The only representations made were made by Rowe, and not for or on behalf of the company, but for his own private gain. Both Buckley and Lindley think Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company Limited (sup.) is bad law, and in the face of subsequent decisions and on general principles it cannot be supported. The present plaintiffs cannot assert a right by estoppel. They referred to Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company, 42 L. T. Rep. 37; 5 Q. B. Div. 188.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. in reply.

Feb. 6.—KENNEDY, J. read the following written judgment:—The principal, although not the only, question in this action is whether the plaintiffs are or are not entitled to recover damages from the defendant company by reason of the company's refusal to place the names of Max Rosenheim and Edmonde Alexandre on the register of shareholders. The material facts are these. [His Lordship stated the facts set out above, and continued:] After I had heard evidence of witnesses called by the plaintiffs and the defendants, from which I have taken the history of the case set out above, and which, as there is really no conflict as to the facts, I see no use in stating more particularly, certain statements and admissions of facts were agreed. [His Lordship referred to these admitted facts set out above, and continued:] Mr. Rufus Isaacs, for the plaintiffs, submitted that there still was a question which ought to be left to the jury as to the liability of the defendants Bewick, Moreing and Co. under the Partnership Act 1890, s. 10. I ruled, however, that there was no case made out against Bewick, Moreing, and Co., and as the only questions of fact, which would otherwise have been questions for the jury, had been settled by the foregoing agreed statements and admissions, the jury was discharged, and the claim of the plaintiffs as against the defendant company was fully argued before me. The plaintiffs' case against the Great Fingall Consolidated Limited is based upon the assertion of a right of the plaintiffs to recover damages from that company for its refusal to recognise the certificate, and register in its books the names of Rosenheim and Alexandre as the owners of the shares numbered in the certificate. It is unquestionably true that upon the faith of this certificate the plaintiffs incurred their liability to Lazard Brothers and Co., and advanced the 20,000*l.* (less stamp fee and commission) to Rowe. If the defendant company is estopped by the certificate from denying the title of Rosenheim and Alexandre, it has, in my view, been decided by the House of Lords that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the company the damages (not exceeding the value of such shares at the date of the company's refusal to register) which they have in fact sustained owing to the refusal of the company to register the purchaser: (Balkis Consolidated Company v. Tomkinson, 69 L. T. Rep. 598; (1893) A. C. 396). At p. 407 Lord Herschell disposes of an adverse argument which had appeared in the judgment of Bowen, L.J. in the case of British Mutual Banking Company Limited v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company (57 L. T. Rep. 833; 18 Q. B. Div. 714) and also in the judgment of Comstock, J., delivered in the Court of Appeals in the American case of Mechanics' Bank v. New York and Newhaven Railway Company (11 N. Y. (Sup. Ct.) Rep., at pp. 574-576), as to the transaction which it was sought to enforce against the company being ultra vires of the company, and therefore one as to which there would be no right to hold the company liable by estoppel. In the course of his remarks upon this point Lord Herschell said: "I do not think this argument is a sound one. A person to whom the company is liable by estoppel to pay damages for refusing to register his transfer does not by reason thereof become a shareholder. Indeed, the very title by estoppel implies that he is not one. It has never been laid down, and is manifestly not the law, that a company is not authorised to employ its funds in paying damages for a wrong done, and, if his right by estoppel is established, the company have as much committed a wrong by refusing to register as shareholder the person whose title they deny as if his title to be registered had in fact been a good one." A further and what I may call a subordinate point was raised by the defendants, that I ought to hold that no right by estoppel could be asserted by the present plaintiffs, because (it was said) the plaintiffs were in the same position as the parties who were held to have no such right in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company (42 L. T. Rep. 37; 5 Q. B. Div. 188), but it appears to me that the circumstances of the two cases are essentially different. The real question is, Do the facts of the present case create a right by estoppel? This was the question, or, at all events, the main question, which was fully and ably argued before me by the learned counsel who appeared for the defendant company. The argument for the plaintiffs, as I understand it, is substantially this. Instruments under seal have always been regarded by our law as instruments of especial solemnity. In old days, whilst it was a defence to an action in a contract under seal that the party's seal had been lost and had been affixed by a stranger without his knowledge, at least if the owner had given public notice of the loss, no such defence was open if the seal had been misapplied by a person in whose custody it was; for then, it was said, it was his own fault for not having it in better keeping: (see Pollock's Principles of Contract, 7th edit., p. 138, and note (n), where the authorities are cited). And in modern days, in regard to the certificates of shares in limited trading companies, the law recognises, for practical and business reasons, a high degree of responsibility resting on the companies whose seal they bear. Stress is laid upon this by the judgments of Cockburn, C.J. and Blackburn, J. in Re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. 467; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 584): "It was the intention of the Legislature," said Blackburn, J. (at p. 590), "that these certificates should be documents on which buyers might safely act." It is unnecessary to quote at length the well-known passage in the judgment of Lord Cairns, L.C. in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls (39 L. T. Rep. 308; 3 App. Cas. 1004, at p. 1017). The 31st section of the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89) enacts that "a certificate under the common seal of the company, specifying any share or shares, or stock held by any member of a company, shall be prima facie evidence of the title of the member to the share or shares or stock therein specified." In the present case the certificate was on its face perfectly regular; it purported to be issued according to the formalities prescribed by the articles of the defendant company—i.e., to be signed by two directors and countersigned by the secretary, it was delivered at the company's office as the genuine certificate of the company by the secretary who had countersigned it and affixed to it the company's seal, to which the company permitted him to have access for the purpose of using it; it is admitted that he was a proper person to deliver such certificates. The certificate was a forged document, no doubt, but as it is apparently genuine and regular, and as it was received by the plaintiffs from a proper custodian and from the company's office, it is agreed by the parties that there was no legal duty on the plaintiffs, who received it, to ascertain, or try to ascertain, the genuineness of the directors' signatures, or to inquire whether the seal had been affixed by the authority of the directors. In Palmer's Company Precedents, 7th edit., p. 17, the learned author says: "Where the regulations contain special provisions as to the affixing of a seal—e.g., that the instrument must also be signed by two directors—those who deal with the company are bound to see that the deed on the face of it accords with the regulations. But, subject as aforesaid, it is to be presumed that where the common seal is affixed to an instrument, it has been duly fixed, and the burden of proving the contrary rests with those that allege it. . . . It by no means follows that, where the seal has been irregularly fixed, the instrument is ineffective: (see County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Steam and House Coal Colliery Company, 72 L. T. Rep. 375; (1895) 1 Ch. 629); Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company, 50 L. T. Rep. 685; 13 Q. B. Div. 103). In both these cases the seal had been irregularly affixed, but the company was held bound by it, for the instrument appeared to be in accord with the regulations, and the irregularity was only in regard to the 'indoor' management, with which an outsider acting in good faith is not concerned." Finally the plaintiffs contend that this case is covered by direct authority which is binding upon this court. They say that in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company (50 L. T. Rep. 685; 13 Q. B. Div. 103) the facts, which were there stated in a special case, were practically identical with those with which I have to deal. The secretary of the defendant company in that case fraudulently forged the director's signature to a share certificate, affixed the company's seal without authority, and issued it to one Gledhill, who took it in good faith. Gledhill deposited the certificate with the plaintiff as security for advances, and executed a transfer of the shares to the plaintiff. The company refused to register the plaintiff as owner of the shares. The Divisional Court (Stephen and Mathew, JJ.) held the company liable for the agreed value of the shares, the question for the court being, as stated in the special case, whether the plaintiff had a good title to the shares as against the company. Stephen, J. bases his judgment on the ground of estoppel, as established by the case of Re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company (sup.). He said: "It is said in answer that here the secretary carried out his fraud by means of forgery. It appears to me that this fact does not make any material difference. The defendants' counsel said it did make a difference on the ground, so far as I understand his argument, that nothing can give validity to a forged instrument as against anybody. That does not seem to me to be the case, and I think the authorities cited for the plaintiff are applicable. The company appear in this case to have prescribed certain formalities with regard to the use of the seal and the issue of certificates. The certificate is to be signed by a director and the secretary. In the present case it apparently does comply with those formalities. . . . A person can inform himself whether the certificate comes from the secretary, because he gets it from the secretary's office, but I do not see how, according to any practicable course of business, he can go behind the certificate and ascertain for himself such matters as whether the signature of the director is genuine. It appears to me, therefore, that the company have authorised the secretary and made it his official duty to act in such a way that his acts amount to a warranty by them of the genuineness of the certificate issued by him." Mathew, J. concurred upon the same grounds, and in the course of his judgment said: "It is obviously indispensable in the ordinary course of business that the secretary should perform these duties"—i.e., the execution of the certificate with the prescribed formalities and its issue—"and it never could have been contemplated that the purchaser of shares should himself ascertain that each of the prescribed formalities had in fact been complied with. . . . It was argued by the counsel for the defendants that the fact that the certificate was a forgery prevented their being liable for the act of their agent, but he failed, as it appeared to me, to establish any difference for this purpose between a fraud carried out by means of forgery and any other fraud." To these arguments of the plaintiffs the defendants oppose the doctrine which was enunciated by Willes, J. in his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (16 L. T. Rep. 461; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 259), and which, after being approved in the House of Lords and in the Privy Council, formed the basis of the decision of the

Court of Appeal in 1887 in British Mutual Banking Company v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company (sup.). That doctrine, as stated in the headnote of the last-mentioned case, is that a principal is not liable in an action of deceit for the unauthorised and fraudulent act of a servant or agent, committed, not for the general or special benefit of the principal, but for the servant's or agent's private ends. It is urged that this principle is applicable here, because, unquestionably, Rowe's acts in forging and issuing the certificate were done for his own personal advantage, and in no way for, or in the interest of, the company, and the company has received no benefit from them. It is, as the defendants urge, not the case of a document which has been issued irregularly, or without the proper formalities or authorisation according to the company's articles, as, for example, the mortgage in County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Steam and House Coal Company (72 L. T. Rep. 375; (1895) 1 Ch. 629), which is referred to by Mr. Palmer in the passage from his book which I have quoted above, but it is the case of a certificate which was never "issued," in any proper sense of the term, by the company. It is the case of a mere forgery committed by a servant of the company by means of a dishonest and unauthorised use of the company's seal wholly for his own private ends. The defendants rely also on the case recently decided in the House of Lords, George Whitechurch Limited v. Cavanagh (85 L. T. Rep. 349; (1902) A. C. 117). In that case the House of Lords (Lord Robertson doubting) held, reversing the decision of Bigham, J. and of the Court of Appeal, that a limited company was not estopped by a fraudulent "certification" of their secretary that certificates for shares were in the company's office, from showing that the proposed transferor had no shares to transfer. There are, no doubt, in the judgments of the noble and learned Lords important observations upon the question of estoppel by representation which make for the defendants' contentions in the present case, but the decision of the House of Lords is as to the existence of an estoppel in the case of a certification—a very different class of document from a share certificate under seal—and both Lord Macnaghten and Lord Brampton refer to that difference. "There is a marked difference," said Lord Macnaghten (at p. 126), "between a certificate and a certification. A certificate is under the seal of the company. By the Companies Act 1862 a certificate is made prima facie evidence of title. If faith were not given to the solemn assertions of a company under its common seal, it would, as Lord Cairns observed in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, paralyse the whole of the dealings with shares in public companies. A certification stands on a different footing altogether. Transfers are never certified under the company's seal. There is no obligation on a company to certify transfers at all. The certification is not passed by the directors or brought before the board." Lord Brampton said: "I take it to be common knowledge of all intelligent men of business that there is a wide and well-recognised difference between a certificate of shares under the seal of the company, which by sect. 31 of the Companies Act 1862 is made prima facie evidence of the title of the person named in it to the shares therein specified (see Re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company), and a transfer certification such as that which appears in the margin of the transfers in question." It appears to me that these pointed discriminations between share certificates and certifications are fairly relied upon by the plaintiffs' counsel as tending to support that part of his argument which rests on the special character of the document in the present case. It appears to me that my judgment properly depends upon the answers which ought to be given to three questions: (1) Is this case distinguishable, on the facts, from Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company? (2) If not, has that decision been overruled, or so treated in subsequent cases that it ought to be treated by me as overruled? (3) If it has been overruled, either expressly or by implication, then upon principle and authority, apart from that case, are the plaintiffs entitled to succeed in the present action? In regard to the first question, I have come to the conclusion that the two cases are in their material facts really indistinguishable. In each case the share certificate, on the faith of which the plaintiff has acted to his loss, was a forgery; in each case that forgery was the act of the secretary of the defendant company acting for his own purposes and profit, and not for or on behalf of or for the benefit of the company. The defendants' counsel in the present case suggested, but not, I think, strongly, that some difference might exist in the fact that Lindo, when he went to the defendant company's office and obtained the certificate, did not know that Rowe was the secretary, and believed him to be a director; and that the certificate was given by Rowe, not in the room marked "Transfer Office," or in a room in any way specially appropriated to the defendant company, but in one of the rooms in the office which might be the board-room of one of the other companies, which, like the defendant company, had their office in Bewick, Moreing, and Co.'s premises. I do not think that these circumstances can be held to make any real difference between the two cases. Lindo expressly deposed that he took the transfer to Rowe as an official of the defendant company, and I see no reason to doubt that he received the certificate also from him as an official of the defendant company. Before he acted on the certificate he knew that Rowe was the secretary. Rowe as secretary was superior to, and, as the defendants' head clerk stated, as secretary, responsible for, the clerks in the transfer department; and I fail to see how anything can turn upon the designation of the room in which the certificate was handed over to Lindo. This brings me to the second question, Has Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company been overruled or disapproved in any way which entitles me to disregard it as an authority of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division which binds me sitting at Nisi Prius? No judgment expressly overruling or disproving of the case was cited to me by counsel, and after careful search I have been unable to find any. In Lord Lindley's Law of Companies it is twice cited. At p. 82 (6th edit.) it is referred to with other cases and without comment in a note to the statement in the text that "the company cannot dispute the truth of the certificate as against the person to whom it is issued if he has suffered loss by acting or remaining inactive on the faith of it, or as against a person who has bought on the faith of it." At p. 668 it is referred to, and its effect and material facts are set out in the text itself, and a note is appended, "Quere whether in this case the secretary was acting for the company so as to bind it by his acts: (see British Mutual Banking Company Limited v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company, 57 L. T. Rep. 833; 18 Q. B. Div. 714). In Buckley, J.'s book on the Companies Acts (8th edit.) it is twice cited, not as being overruled by any later decision, but with the author's disapproval. At p. 103, after summarising the case, the author proceeds: "It is conceived that this case misapplied the principle of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, for the secretary was clearly acting not for the benefit, i.e., for or on behalf of the company, but for his own interest, and in such case the company is not, in an action for deceit, liable for the fraud of its agent." At p. 117, after a reference to the law as laid down in British Mutual Banking Company v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company, the learned author says that the decision in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company cannot, it is conceived, be reconciled with the principle as stated by the Court of Appeal in the former case. In Mr. Palmer's work on the law of companies the case is frequently cited, and nowhere with disapproval, or with any intimation that in the writer's opinion it can be treated as overruled. Now, although I myself might not have so decided, I should not be justified as a judge sitting at Nisi Prius in not conforming to a judgment of the Divisional Court which has not been expressly overruled or judicially disapproved, unless it was absolutely and unquestionably clear that it was inconsistent and could not be reconciled with later decisions of higher authority. I cannot say this in the present case. The guarded form in which such eminent authorities as Lord Lindley and Buckley, J. express their doubts of the correctness, in view of later cases, of the judgment of Mathew, L.J. and Stephen, J. in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company affords in itself strong reason for my conclusion on this point. And, further, the thought which I have given to the matter since the trial has suggested to me two considerations which it might be argued at all events should be held to enable the law as laid down in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company to be upheld without encroachment upon the principle of law enunciated by Willes, J. in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank and enforced by the Court of Appeal in British Mutual Banking Company v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company. The first of these considerations is that the doctrine as enunciated by Willes, J., and as approved and applied in the last-named case, is expressly in reference to an action of deceit. The right claimed by the plaintiffs in the case before Mathew, L.J. and Stephen, J., like the right claimed by the plaintiffs in the present case, to use the language of Bramwell, L.J. in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company (42 L. T. Rep. 377; 5 Q. B. Div. 188, at p. 202), is a right by estoppel. The nature of the claims in such an action and in an action of deceit are not identical, and the measure of the damages is not, I think, necessarily the same, though it may be so in some cases. The claim in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company was for compensation limited to the value of the shares, the plaintiff's title to which by estoppel the court held to have been wrongly denied by the defendant company. In an action of deceit the defendant, if held liable, is liable to a judgment for all the pecuniary loss of the plaintiff which has flowed naturally from the deceit. The second consideration is that which arises from the fact that in Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company, as in the present case, the case depended upon the liability of the company sued, not in respect of oral representations of a secretary as in British Mutual Banking Company v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company, nor in respect of a fraudulent "certification," which formed one of the two bases of claim in George Whitechurch Limited v. Cavanagh, but in respect of a share certificate under a company's seal, apparently genuine, created in the company's office by the company's servant, and issued to the recipient by a proper officer of the company; a document of a class to which, in the eye of the law of England, solemnity has always attached, and to which, in the case of trading companies, the Legislature intended, and, as Lord Cairns, Lord Blackburn, Lord Esher, and Lord Macnaghten have from time to time emphatically pointed out, the interests of mercantile business require that a large extent of faith should be given. After giving, however, full weight to these considerations, not only as tending to reconcile Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company with such cases as British Mutual Banking Company v. Charnwood Forest Railway Company, but also to support the plaintiffs' contention in the present case; after giving also, I hope, full weight to the arguments so ably put before me by the plaintiffs' counsel, I still feel myself bound to say that I decide this case, as I do, in the plaintiffs' favour simply because I cannot on the facts distinguish this case from Shaw v. Port Phillip and Colonial Gold Mining Company, and by that case I feel myself bound. If I had not felt myself so bound—I say it, of course, with profound respect for the learned judges who decided it—I should have preferred the view that a company is not in such a case as the present legally liable to make good the loss to a third party which has been caused by the fraud and forgery of its servant wholly without authority, and not for the company's purposes or benefit, but solely for his own private purposes and ends. Of course, in a case of so much gravity, and in which so large a sum of money depends upon the issue, the litigation will not stop here, and I have felt it my duty to deal at a length which I should otherwise have wished to avoid with the facts and the arguments and considerations relevant to those facts in order to give all the help I may to the parties concerned and to those who may hereafter have to consider this important case.

In the Goods of WILLIAM SMITH. (a)

Probate—Colonial grant—Limited grant—Re-sealing—Colonial Probate Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 6).If the proper conditions prescribed by the Colonial Probate Act 1892 have been complied with, a limited colonial grant may be resealed in the United Kingdom.

APPLICATION.

William Smith, a person domiciled and resident in the island of St. Vincent, West Indies, died on the 1st April 1900. At that time the said William Smith was the administrator of the estate of one George Smith, who had died in 1894. George Smith was also domiciled and resident in St. Vincent at the time of his death. Part of the estate of George Smith consisted of certain deposit receipts and other documents contained in a box, and this box was in the possession of the Colonial Bank at Kingston, St. Vincent, when William Smith died in 1900. The deposit receipts and the documents stood in the name of William Smith. After the death of William Smith the Supreme Court of Judicature of St. Vincent granted letters of administration de bonis non in respect of the estate of George Smith to Elspet Smith, his widow. On the 28th June 1901 the widow applied for and obtained from the Supreme Court letters of administration to the estate of William Smith, but limited to "all the moneys and interests standing in the Colonial Bank in St. Vincent on deposit or otherwise in the name and to the credit of the said William Smith, and also so far only as concerns all the moneys in a box in the said bank left there for safe custody by Alexander Smith, William Alexander George Nanton, and Conrad Johnson Simmons, and the following securities, namely, (1) the Colonial Bank of New Zealand deposit receipt for the sum of 50*l.*, dated the 20th Dec. 1884, and numbered 181,194, and the moneys thereby secured; (2) the Colonial Bank of New Zealand deposit receipt for the sum of 100*l.*, dated the 1st July 1890, and numbered 8453, and the moneys thereby secured; (3) the East London Savings Bank book, showing a deposit of 10*l.* in favour of the said William Smith, and the moneys thereby secured," being the property of George Smith in the hands of William Smith. All the next of kin of William Smith had consented to the application of the widow, Elspet Smith, for the limited grant in the colonial court, and had made affidavits in favour of the application. It was now sought to have the letters of administration resealed in accordance with the provisions of the Colonial Probate Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 6). Before making formal application for the re-sealing of the limited grant the solicitors for the applicant wrote the following letter to one of the principal registrars of the Probate Division, dated the 24th Oct. 1903:

On the 28th June 1901, letters of administration of the effects (limited as after mentioned) of William Smith, the younger, who died on the 1st April 1900 at St. Vincent, where he was domiciled, were granted by the Superior Court of Judicature in St. Vincent to Elspet Smith, widow of George Smith, of whose estate his brother, William Smith, was administrator. William Smith received various sums of money belonging to the estate of George Smith, which, according to the custom of St. Vincent, were deposited in his own name, and not as administrator, and included a deposit of 50*l.* at the Colonial Bank of New Zealand, another for 100*l.* at the same bank, and 10*l.* in the East London Savings Bank. The letters of administration granted in 1901 as above were limited to some money in St. Vincent and to the funds above specified, and they were granted upon the renunciation and with the consent of Alexander Smith, Isabella Nanton, Margery Smith, and Rosalie Mitchell, the sole next of kin of the deceased. The letters of administration and office copies of the several renunciations are here, and Elspet Smith desires to have them resealed with the seal of the English Court to enable her to obtain payment of the sums in this country, amounting to about 160*l.* On the 19th Sept. 1903, letters of administration to the effects of the said William Smith, the younger (except those included in the grant of 1901, which is therein mentioned), were granted by the court in St. Vincent to Alexander Smith, one of the next of kin. The next of kin of William Smith, the younger, considered the said Elspet Smith, under the circumstances above stated, to be a creditor of the intestate as regarded the securities specified in the grant to her, and therefore renounced and consented to it. The above facts can, if necessary, be verified by the affidavit of Elspet Smith, and no doubt by an independent party. We shall be glad to know whether, under these circumstances, the letters of administration of the 8th June 1901 will be resealed on presentation, as in the case of a Scotch or Irish grant, or what further evidence will be required. It will be observed that the assets are very small, and it is therefore desirable to save expense as much as possible.

The registrar of the Probate Registry refused to deal with the question by correspondence, but suggested an interview, which was accordingly arranged. At the interview the registrar saw all the documents referred to, and expressed an opinion that the letters of administration could be resealed. The notice required by the rules was thereupon advertised in the Times, and the ordinary steps taken for obtaining the re-sealing. When application was made, however, for the letters of administration to be handed out, the solicitors for the applicant were informed that the registrars had found that there was no precedent in the matter and declined to make one, as the Colonial Probate Act only said that letters of administration "may" be resealed, and not that they "must" be.

In order that there should be no mistake as to facts if the case had eventually to be brought into court, another letter was addressed to the registrars on the 28th Nov. 1903, in the following terms:

The facts of this case are fully stated in our letter of the 24th Oct. 1903. In consequence of your reply objecting to entering into the question in writing, we attended on the 27th Oct., and the registrar in attendance at once said that the letters of administration granted by the court in St. Vincent could be resealed here as desired. We accordingly gave notice by advertisements, as required by your orders, of the intended application, and obtained and lodged the necessary affidavits and bond; but, to our surprise, on applying for the letters resealed, we were informed that as this was the first application of the kind, and as the Act of Parliament used the word "may" and not "must," the registrars refused to allow the letters of administration to be resealed. This statement seems so utterly incredible that we considered it would be an injustice to you to take further action and publish such a statement without giving you an opportunity of correcting it, if not correct. Moreover, it is very desirable that, in any future development of this case, there should be no dispute as to facts, as many people would be inclined to doubt that such an objection could have been raised. There always must be a first case, and therefore if this is one, that can be no objection; and if the point raised as to the words "may" and "must" had any weight, it would simply enable an application to be capriciously refused. Our client is much inconvenienced by the delay, and has already been put to some expense, so we should not feel justified in letting the matter drop. As there can be no mistake about a written statement, though there may be about a verbal one, we think it better, notwithstanding your previous letter, to write to you; and, unless we receive a reply within a week stating in what respects (if any) the above statement is inaccurate, or on what grounds you refuse to reseat the letters of administration granted in St. Vincent, we shall assume that the statement is accurate, and that there is no other ground than that above stated for refusing the application to reseat.

The registrars again refused to commit themselves by a written reply, but at an interview the solicitors were informed that the refusal to reseat was not grounded upon the word in the Act of Parliament being "may" and not "must," but because they had a discretion under the Act, and they refused to make a precedent. It was further suggested that the grant made by the Court of St. Vincent was irregular.

In consequence of the refusal and the objections of the registrars, an application was made to the court, on motion, for the resealing of the limited colonial grant.

Barnard for the applicant.—The Bank of New Zealand, having their principal office in London, had refused to part with the securities until the limited grant of the letters of administration had been resealed in England. There was no limitation contained in the Colonial Probate Act, 1892, as to the kind of grant which might be resealed. It was necessary to get the authority of the Colonial Bank of New Zealand in England to draw out the money on deposit. The registrars had raised the point as to the grant being ultra vires, but they had no power to consider that.

BUCKNILL, J.—There is no necessity to consider the last point. The difficulty seems to me to be as to what ought to be done in this country, and why it could not be done in St. Vincent. However, I am of opinion that if the facts set out in the letters to the registrars are verified by affidavit, the court has power, under the Colonial Probate Act, to order that the limited grant made in the colonial court be resealed here. I shall therefore order that the grant be resealed.

ACTION.

Suit for the revocation of a grant of letters of administration, but there was a further question raised as to the legitimacy of the defendant.

The plaintiff was Abraham Payne, and he claimed, as the lawful nephew and one of the next of kin of Mary Goodrich, late of Shelland, Suffolk, who died a widow, intestate, and without child or parent, on the 6th March 1902, that the grant of letters of administration made on the 16th May 1902 to the defendant, Ellen Bennett, should be revoked. The ground for seeking revocation was that the said Ellen Bennett was not the natural and lawful daughter of the deceased intestate. There was a further claim by the plaintiff that letters of administration should be granted to him. The defendant denied these allegations, and declared that she was entitled to the grant.

The plaintiff, Abraham Payne, was the son of James Payne, the brother of the deceased intestate, Mary Goodrich. The defendant, Ellen Bennett, was the daughter of the deceased intestate; but there was a question as to whether she was or was not born in wedlock. Mrs. Goodrich was married on the 9th April 1844, but it was alleged that Ellen Bennett was born on the 20th Feb. of the same year, and was therefore illegitimate, and not entitled, therefore, to a grant of letters of administration.

Priestley, K.C. and Sherrington for the plaintiff.—They put in a birth certificate, dated the 1st May 1844, recording the fact of the birth of one Ellen Goodrich on the 20th Feb. 1844, the daughter of George Goodrich and Mary Goodrich, formerly Payne. The evidence of Thomas Pearson Johnson, taken on commission, was also put in. The witness deposed to the fact that he had been taken by his grandfather to the wedding of George Goodrich and Mary Payne when he was seven years of age; that the defendant, Ellen, was their daughter; and that Mrs. Goodrich had told him that Ellen was her illegitimate child. As to the admissibility of this evidence they referred to

May for the defendant.—The document as to the birth was not admissible. There was no compulsion under the Act of William IV. on any person to give information as to the birth of a child. Registration had to be paid for. It was a well-known fact that immense numbers of births were never registered. The document was only evidence of the fact of birth, and that the birth took place before the date of the registration:

Re Wintle, 21 L. T. Rep. 781; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 373.

[The PRESIDENT.—I cannot really follow the reasoning of Lord Romilly in that case. Sect. 38 of the Act of 1836 says that a certified copy is to be received as evidence "of the birth," whereas Lord Romilly says "of the fact of birth, and nothing more."] In Wiher v. Law (3 Stark. 63) Bayley, J. held that a certificate of baptism was not evidence as to the date of birth so as to prove the age of the party. He also cited

Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes, 1 Moo. & Rob. 386;

Huntley v. Donovan, 15 Q. B. 96;

Ryan v. Ring, 25 L. Rep. (Ir.) 184.

Priestley in reply.—The point now raised had been decided in Reg. v. Weaver (29 L. T. Rep. 544; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 85). There, upon an indictment for carnally knowing a girl, being above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years, a certified copy of an entry similar to the present, showing that the child was of the age of eleven years and eight months, was held sufficient proof of the age, there being independent evidence of the identity of the girl with the child whose name was entered in the book. The decision in Re Wintle (ubi sup.) had been adversely criticised by the editor in Taylor on Evidence.

The PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that this certificate which has been produced is evidence not only of the fact of the birth of the defendant, but also of the date of the birth. It seems to me that a much too limited force has been placed upon the word "required" used in sect. 38 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 88), and I see no reason why the Act of Parliament should have limited it. There is not, to my mind, any ground for suggesting that information given under compulsion is more likely to be true than information which is given voluntarily. I do not feel any difficulty at all in holding that the certificate is evidence, and evidence of the contents of the document. It is true that there is the decision of Lord Romilly in the case of Re Wintle (ubi sup.), which is opposed to my own view of the matter, for it is clear that Lord Romilly did draw a distinction between the evidence of the fact of the birth of a child and the evidence of the actual date of birth. But it seems that that case has never been followed, and the opinion of one eminent authority has been quoted against it. Again, the case of Reg. v. Weaver (ubi sup.) has been referred to, and that seems to me to be conclusive, for, being a criminal case, it is certain that a conviction would not have been upheld if there had been any doubt as to the law upon the subject and the admissibility of the evidence. Personally I had always thought that the production of a certificate of this kind was the ordinary method of proving the date of birth of a person, and that every court of justice held the same view. I have no hesitation and no doubt in the matter.

TOMALIN v. SMART. (a)

Probate—Action for revocation—Counter-claim propounding will—Notice by plaintiff to cross-examine—Order XXI., r. 18—Costs—Practice.

The plaintiff brought an action for revocation of probate which had been granted in common form, and the defendant, by way of counter-claim, propounded the will. In his reply and defence to the counter-claim the plaintiff gave notice, under Order XXI., r. 18, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, that he merely insisted on the will being proved in solemn form, and that it was simply his intention to cross-examine the witnesses.

Held, that in the construction of this rule the principle which guided the Ecclesiastical Courts and the Probate Courts ought to be considered; that there was a distinction between a party who sought a revocation of probate and one who entered a caveat and took the ordinary steps to oppose a will being admitted to proof; and that the present plaintiff could not secure the benefit of the rule as to costs, since the notice given by him was bad.

ACTION.

Action for revocation of probate, in which the question of the right of a plaintiff to give a notice under Order XXI., r. 18, together with his defence and counter-claim, arose.

The plaintiff was George Reynolds Tomalin, and he sought to obtain revocation of the probate of the will of his wife, Alice Tomalin, who died in Guy's Hospital on the 11th Feb. 1903. The will was executed on the 28th Jan. 1903, and probate was granted in common form on the 22nd Feb. 1903. In his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that

The pretended last will was not signed or executed by Alice Tomalin in the presence of R. W. Henstie, one of the alleged attesting witnesses; that the said Alice Tomalin did not request the said R. W. Henstie to sign or subscribe his name to the said pretended will as an attesting witness; and that the alleged attesting witness, John Groves, did not subscribe his name to the said pretended will in the presence of the said R. W. Henstie. The above are the only reasons why the plaintiff alleges . . . that the said pretended will is not the will of the said Alice Tomalin.

He also claimed a grant of letters of administration to himself.

The defendant, George Smart, was one of the executors named in the will. In his defence he denied the allegations set up in the statement of claim as to undue execution, and propounded the will by way of counter-claim. With his reply and defence to the counter-claim the plaintiff filed the following notice:

Take notice that the plaintiff merely insists upon the pretended will, dated the 28th day of January 1903, of Alice Tomalin being proved in solemn form of law, and only intends to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of the said will propounded in the counter-claim, and gives this notice pursuant to Order XXI., r. 18, of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

Order XXI., r. 18, is as follows:

In probate actions the party opposing a will may, with his defence, give notice to the party setting up the will that he merely insists upon the will being proved in solemn form of law, and only intends to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of the will, and he shall thereupon be at liberty to do so, and shall not, in any event, be liable to pay the costs of the other side, unless the judge shall be of opinion that there was no reasonable ground for opposing the will.

The notice was returned by the defendant's solicitors, who asserted that the rule did not apply, and gave notice that the defendant would take objection to it if the plaintiff attempted to make use of it. At the hearing of the case objection was taken to the notice on the ground that it was the rule in probate actions that the party opposing the will might give notice of his intention to cross-examine along with his defence, but that the plaintiff was not such a party, since he was seeking a revocation of probate.

W. L. Richards, for the plaintiff, submitted that the notice was good. It was delivered along with the defence to the counter-claim. The defendant was seeking to establish the will, and his counter-claim was the same thing as an original action. The words of the rule refer to a "party" who gives the notice, and certainly the plaintiff was a party.

Pritchard for the defendant.—The plaintiff was not in the position of a defendant who opposed probate. He had brought his own action to revoke a probate already granted, and that made all the difference. He cited

Plaintiff might have entered a caveat, and could then have taken advantage of the rule. Instead of doing so, he had rushed into litigation on his own account.

Richards in reply.—The case of Beale v. Beale (ubi sup.) was distinguished in Leigh v. Green (1892) P. 17. The former case was decided before the present rules came into existence. Now, under the rules of the Supreme Court of 1883, a statement of claim included a counter-claim, and a defence to a counter-claim was the same thing as a defence to a statement of claim. There was no difference as to this between the Probate and other divisions of the High Court. It would be a great hardship if it was held that there was any difference. In the present case the probate was obtained very few days after the death of the testatrix, and the plaintiff was practically precluded from being placed in the position of a defendant by the action of the executor. He also cited

The PRESIDENT.—I am very much impressed with the practice in the Prerogative Court, where it was clear that a distinction was drawn between a person who opposed a will in the first instance and one who attacked a will after probate had been granted. And now, after the arguments that have been addressed to me, I realise the effect of the decision in Beale v. Beale (ubi sup.), which illustrates the distinction. I think the sense of the distinction lies in the fact that a person who wishes to oppose the probate of a will ought to announce his intention by entering a caveat as soon as possible, and taking the subsequent steps in the usual way. In such circumstances he is able to put the party who is setting up the will to proof in solemn form without much fear of having to pay the costs of the proceedings, because, although there has been a modification in the former rule of practice so as to give the court a discretion as to costs, this modification does not affect the point that the safety from being condemned in costs is afforded to the party opposing the will. It does not say that the same protection will be afforded to a person who opposes the probate of a will—that is, a person seeking to recall a probate already granted, as here. It is certainly true that a counter-claim is, under the rules of the Supreme Court, to be treated as a statement of claim; but when I am called upon to construe a rule which is admitted to be a modification of a previous rule, I think that it is only fair and proper to inquire into the principles which were applied under the earlier rule, and to hold that the same principles ought to be applied under the new rule. If my view is the correct one, Order XXI., r. 18, does not apply to the case of a party who is seeking the revocation of a probate already granted. Its operation is confined to the case of a party who opposes a will which another party is seeking to prove in solemn form. There is, however, a discretion conferred on the court as to dealing with the costs, and I shall deal with them after the case has been heard.

[Eventually the court found that the will had been duly executed, and ordered probate to be delivered out to the defendant. The plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs.]

WYKE v. WYKE (the King's Proctor showing cause).

[Div.]

The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28.—BUCKNILL, J.—In this case the wife is the petitioner, and she seeks to be divorced from her husband on the ground of his adultery and cruelty. The parties were married on the 28th Oct. 1891. There were three children born of the marriage: Lillian, born in March 1893; Harold, born in 1895; and Ada Ethel, born in Sept. 1897. The petitioner, in her petition, which was filed in Nov. 1902, alleged frequent acts of cruelty by the respondent in 1893 down to 1899; also, that he committed incestuous adultery in Jan. 1899, up to October in that year; and that, so soon as the petitioner became aware of it, in Sept. 1899, she left him, and had not since returned to cohabitation with him. The petition came on for hearing before the President on the 21st April 1903, when a decree nisi was pronounced. On the 14th Oct. 1903 the King's Proctor intervened, and, by his plea, alleged that the petitioner had often committed adultery with one William Earle, and had, on the 28th July 1903, borne a child to him, and had, since the 4th May 1903, been living with him as his wife. To this plea there was no answer, and on the 11th Dec. 1903 the matter came before me on motion, when the petitioner gave evidence. Her story was that when she left her husband in Sept. 1899, she obtained a situation as a barmaid, and managed to save enough money to institute these divorce proceedings; that she afterwards fell ill, and was in hospital for a long time, leaving it shortly before her petition came on for hearing, and could not afterwards get another situation, and was unable to do any hard work in consequence of a bodily ailment, which incapacitated her. "Then" (to use her own words) "when this young gentleman asked me to go and live with him, it was the only thing left for me to do, as I had expended all my earnings, which I had saved up, on the decree, to get what I wanted, so that I could marry again." She also stated that this same man was the father of her child, which was born in July 1903. Therefore, although she says she only went to live with him after the decree nisi, she committed adultery with him when she was earning her living as a barmaid, and whilst she says she was preparing her case for the divorce proceedings. On these facts can I exercise the discretion given to me by the 31st section of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857, and pronounce a decree absolute, dissolving the marriage notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner? In McCord v. McCord, Ogle, and Coxon (33 L. T. Rep. 264; L. Rep. 3 P. & D. 237) Sir James Hannen thus stated the position: "The instances in which the court has pronounced a decree for dissolution of marriage, notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner, are very rare. I am only aware of two cases, that of Joseph v. Joseph and Wentzell (13 W. R. 872; 34 L. J. 96, P. & M.), where the petitioner had committed what may be called innocent adultery by marrying again in the mistaken belief that his wife was dead, and the case of Coleman v. Coleman (13 L. T. Rep. 684; L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 81), where it appeared to the court that the petitioner had been compelled by her husband to prostitute herself." At p. 241 of the report the President pointed out that whilst he would not say that under no circumstances would the court grant relief to a guilty petitioner when he or she had been fully forgiven for an act of adultery, yet the court would never act on a loose and unfettered discretion, as Lord Penzance had expressed it in Morgan v. Morgan and Porter (20 L. T. Rep. 588; L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 644), but always on some definite principle which would serve as a future guide. That principle had been laid down by Lord Penzance, in the same case, to be, that there must be some special circumstances attending the adultery of the petitioner, or special feature placing it in some category capable of distinct statement and recognition. Twelve years afterwards, in Story v. Story and O'Connor (57 L. T. Rep. 536; 12 P. Div. 196) Sir James Hannen referred to his judgment in McCord v. McCord, Ogle, and Coxon (ubi sup.). He said: "I had occasion, as long ago as in 1875, to go very carefully into this question, examining the principles on which my predecessors had acted, and I endeavoured to lay down a guide for myself. I have acted in accordance with those principles ever since." It was not until ten years after that case that it was decided, in terms, that misconduct of a petitioner, which in fact conduced directly to the subsequent adultery of the wife, might be taken into consideration as a ground for exercising the discretion given by the 31st section. I refer to Symons v. Symons (77 L. T. Rep. 142; (1897) P. 167), decided by the President (Sir F. H. Jeune). There the wife was petitioner, and she obtained a decree nisi on the grounds of her husband's adultery and desertion. The Queen's Proctor intervened, alleging her adultery. It is not necessary to refer to the facts of that case, but I quote the language of Jeune, P. He said: "I have no doubt that the husband's adultery and cruelty before his desertion and his prolonged desertion were the main causes of the wife's adultery, and he was guilty, therefore, of misconduct conducing to her adultery. So far as I know, this has not yet been decided to be one of the circumstances on which the discretion to allow a divorce may be exercised." And he said, referring to the facts of that case: "On principle, there appear to me to be strong reasons for holding that wilful neglect or misconduct by a husband should constitute matters, possibly not always conclusive, but fit to be taken into consideration in exercising the discretion whether a divorce shall be granted against him." In that case the decree nisi was made absolute. That decision was followed by Constantinidi v. Constantinidi and Lance (89 L. T. Rep. 340; (1903) P. 246). There the husband was petitioner, and a decree nisi was granted. The President pointed out during the arguments that in Symons v. Symons (ubi sup.) he found as a fact that the husband (the respondent) was actually responsible for and drove his wife to commit adultery; by which I understand that his misconduct conduced directly to her adultery. In his judgment the President said that sect. 31 conferred "a discretion on the Divorce Court, without imposing specifically any limitations or any direction with regard to its exercise." Whilst accepting that dictum as binding it seems to me that it goes farther than any previous authority on the subject. That case must, of course, be determined according to its own facts. No feeling of sympathy, as, for instance, on behalf of an ill-treated woman, as in this case, can be entertained; nor may I listen to the appeal that she made to me, that if she can obtain her divorce to-day, another man is ready to marry her, and take her child. The only question is this, Was her misconduct caused directly by her husband's cruelty and adultery? It is not enough that I could find, using the language of Lord Penzance in Morgan v. Morgan and Porter (ubi sup.), that her conduct was "more or less pardonable or capable of excuse." Perhaps it was to some extent, and, in a sense, her husband's misconduct conduced to that which she did three years after she left him, because, but for his cruelty to her and his adultery with her sister, she would probably be living with him now. Her leaving him was directly caused by his conduct, but, in my opinion, her subsequent adultery was not. From Oct. 1899 to Oct. or Nov. 1902 she lead a respectable life, earning her living, and was, she says, saving money slowly, so that she might take proceedings for divorce. Then she met the man with whom she is now living, and by whom she had a child in July 1903. How can it be truly said that her conduct then was directly caused by her husband's conduct before she left him? In my opinion it is impossible so to decide, and my judgment must therefore be, and is, that the decree nisi be rescinded and the petition dismissed with costs.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS. (a)

Separation — Desertion — Condonation — Second separation — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 7.

Where an offence has been committed which prima facie entitles a married woman to an order under sect. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, and the offence has been condoned by the wife, the effect of such condonation depends upon the common law and not upon any section of that Act.

A married woman issued a summons against her husband complaining of his desertion. The hearing of the summons was adjourned by the justices before whom it came, and before the resumed hearing the wife resumed cohabitation with her husband. She subsequently left him — this also before the resumed hearing — and the justices at the hearing granted her an order for separation and an allowance for maintenance.

Held, the order must be discharged since the wife had put an end to the original cause of complaint by the resumption of cohabitation, and that the justices had nothing to adjudicate upon at the date of the adjourned hearing when the order was made.

APPEAL from justices.

Appeal by William Henry Williams from an order, dated the 28th Oct. 1903, made by the justices of Salford, under which he was adjudged to have been guilty of desertion of his wife, and in virtue of which she was granted a separation and maintenance at the rate of 10s. per week.

The parties were married on the 16th May 1903 and the husband left his wife on the 3rd Aug. The wife lodged a complaint two days later, and the summons came on for hearing on the 14th Aug. After the wife had given her evidence the justices suggested that there should be an adjournment with a view to the reconciliation of the parties. The hearing was accordingly adjourned until the 28th Oct.

On the 29th Aug. cohabitation was resumed, and Mr. and Mrs. Williams lived as husband and wife for a month, when fresh differences arose. They remained, however, under the same roof, and when the date of the adjourned hearing arrived the wife obtained an order from the justices, unknown to her husband, by representing to them that she was living apart from her husband. A week later the husband applied to the justices for a rescission of the order on the ground that the original offence, if any, had been condoned by the resumption of cohabitation. The justices refused, however, to rescind the order.

The husband appealed.

Lushington for the appellant.—There was no power for the justices to make the order after a resumption of cohabitation. The cause of complaint, the original alleged desertion, was gone. It was expressly provided by sect. 7 of the Act that any order made under the Act was put an end to by the resumption of cohabitation. There must be actual desertion at the date when the order is made. In a matrimonial suit in the Divorce Court condonation would be a complete answer to a charge of desertion, and the same thing must have been intended by the Legislature under the Act of 1895. At common law condonation is an answer:

Harris v. Morris, 4 Esp. 41.

If a man had been convicted of an assault upon his wife, had served his sentence, and then lived with her again, could the fact of the assault be brought up against him again? Condonation is expressly recognised under sect. 6 of the Act in the case of the adultery of the wife.

The respondent was not represented.

The PRESIDENT.—It is unfortunate that the wife is not represented here to-day, as it would have been an advantage to hear what might have been said on her behalf. As far as I can judge, however, it is scarcely possible to conceive any argument which could afford an answer to what has been urged by the counsel for the appellant. From the facts of the case it seems that during the adjournment of the summons a resumption of cohabitation took place between the husband and wife, the very thing the justices desired. Now, what is the effect of this? It is true that the case does not come exactly within the terms of sect. 7 of the Act of 1895, because it took place during the course of the litigation and before the date of the order. The effect of the condonation was to put an end to the cause of complaint by force of law, and not by virtue of the Act. The principle that an end is put to desertion by a resumption of cohabitation, a principle acted upon by the judges of this court and by their predecessors in the Ecclesiastical Courts, is founded on the common law. During the course of the argument the case of Haddon v. Haddon (56 L. T. Rep. 716; 18 Q. B. Div. 778) was referred to by Barnes, J. It appears from that case that there had been a conviction before a court of summary jurisdiction under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19)—and it should be noted that the Act of 1878 contained a provision as to condonation similar to that found in the Act of 1895—and afterwards a resumption of cohabitation took place. It was held by Hawkins and Smith, J.J. that the wife could not, after leaving her husband a second time, enforce the order which had originally been made by the justices. In the course of his judgment in that case Hawkins, J. referred to the case of Bateman v. Countess of Ross (1 Dow, 235), decided by Lord Eldon, who, speaking of the effect of a reconciliation of married persons after a separation, “held the general doctrine to be clear that a reconciliation after a separation entirely did away with the effects of it,” and that “this rested upon the ground of public policy, as it must not be permitted to parties to make arrangements for themselves, to hold good whenever they chose to live separate.” And he added farther, “I am not aware that this general proposition has ever been dissented from.” And I believe that such is the case, though no doubt the reason given by Lord Eldon is obsolete. Under the circumstances I have no hesitation at all in holding that the resumption of cohabitation during the adjournment of the summons in this case put an end to the cause of complaint, and that the power of the justices to make any order under the Act had completely passed away. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed, and the order discharged.

BARNES, J.—I entirely agree, but I wish to make a reference to the last clause of sect. 7 of the Act of 1895, which provides that “if any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act, or the Acts mentioned in the schedule hereto, or either of them, shall voluntarily resume cohabitation with her husband . . . such order shall, upon proof thereof, be discharged.” That provision is based upon the principle that the resumption of cohabitation by the wife condones and puts an end to the cause of complaint. If, therefore, it is shown that the parties have voluntarily resumed cohabitation any cause of complaint which one of them had against the other must have been put an end to by the mere fact of the resumption of cohabitation.

FROWD v. FROWD. (a)

Separation order—Desertion of husband—Reasonable cause—Rejection of evidences—Appeal—Remission to justices—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 6.

The word “desertion” used in sect. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 has the same meaning as in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85). It does not signify simply cessation of cohabitation, but cessation of cohabitation without reasonable cause.

It is the duty of justices before whom a summons under the Act of 1895 is heard to allow the husband to cross-examine his wife as to her conduct, and to admit evidence on his behalf showing that the husband has a reasonable excuse or cause for refusing to live with his wife and so to leave her.

If the justices find that the husband had reasonable cause for separating from his wife, there is no desertion under sect. 4 of the Act of 1895, and the wife is not entitled to any order.

APPEAL from justices.

Appeal by the husband, Herbert Haddon Frowd, from an order of the justices of Eastbourne, dated the 1st Feb. 1904, by which a separation order was granted to the wife, Rose Fanny Frowd, on the ground of the desertion of her husband. By the order a sum of 15s. per week was awarded to the wife for her maintenance, and she was allowed reasonable access to her child, the custody remaining with the husband.

The parties were married on the 28th April 1896, and the only child of the marriage was born in 1899.

Early in 1902 the wife confessed to having committed adultery with one Dyer on numerous occasions, and Dyer subsequently admitted the offence.

On the 14th Feb. 1902 the husband forgave his wife, and the parties became reconciled on her undertaking to hold no further communication with Dyer, and on the payment of a sum of 25l. by Dyer to the appellant.

Early in July 1902 the wife remained out all night, and the husband charged her with having committed adultery with one Wenham. She denied the charge, and for ten days remained under the same roof as her husband; but he treated her with such unkindness and kept her so short of food that she was compelled to leave the house on the 18th July.

Immediately after her departure she took out a summons against her husband for desertion, but the hearing was adjourned on the understanding that divorce proceedings were pending between the parties.

Meanwhile the husband discovered that his wife had been in constant communication with Dyer, and had written a large number of letters of a questionable character to him. She was also alleged to have made an indecent sketch and to have written some amorous verses. These were produced at the hearing of the divorce suit in May 1903, when the jury found that the wife had not committed adultery with Wenham.

After the divorce suit Mrs. Frowd wrote to her husband asking him to take her back, but he refused absolutely, offering, however, to agree to a separation and to pay her a sum of 10s. per week, he retaining the custody of the child. This offer was declined by Mrs. Frowd, and a summons under the Act of 1895 was taken out by her and came on for hearing before the justices at Eastbourne on the 1st Feb. 1904.

After hearing the facts as to the circumstances under which she left her husband's house on the 18th July 1902, the justices were of opinion that nothing except adultery could exonerate the husband from liability to provide maintenance for his wife, and declined to allow her to be cross-examined as to her conduct, or witnesses to be called on behalf of the husband to show that there was reasonable cause on his part for refusing to live with her. They granted a separation order as above stated, and maintenance at the rate of 15s. per week.

[Div.]

The husband appealed.

The grounds of appeal set out in his notice were:

(1) That defendant had not and never has deserted the said applicant within the meaning of sect. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895.

(2) That the evidence upon which such order or finding was made was not sufficient in law or in fact to justify such judgment, order or finding.

(3) That the said justices were wrong in refusing to allow the said applicant to be cross-examined, and in refusing to admit the evidence tendered on behalf of the defendant with a view to showing that the separation (if any) which had taken place between the said applicant and the said defendant had been brought about by the conduct of the said applicant, which conduct, though not amounting to a matrimonial offence, disabled the said applicant from contending that the said defendant had deserted her.

Le Bas for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in refusing to admit the evidence tendered. Whatever the conduct of the husband had been at the time when the wife left her home, the justices were bound to take into consideration the conduct of the wife before and after the separation took place. The whole of the correspondence with Dyer had not been discovered on the 18th July, 1903. Desertion had been considered over and over again in that court, and the meaning of the word had been well defined. Even if there was not sufficient cause in the first instance for the husband to turn his wife out of doors, the knowledge afterwards obtained by him might be sufficient to justify him in refusing to resume cohabitation with her. He referred to

J. A. Slater (E. E. Humphrys with him) for the respondent.—The desertion intended by sect. 4 of the Act of 1895 was not the same thing as that of the Act of 1857. In the latter Act the words "without reasonable cause" occur. These are wanting in the Act of 1895. It was sufficient for the justices to find the fact that the husband had left his wife or acted in such a manner that she had been compelled to leave him, and then, by virtue of sect. 6 of the Act, there was nothing but her uncondoned adultery that could disentitle her to an order. [The PRESIDENT.—If the conduct of the wife is so bad that it is intolerable for her husband to live with her, can he be said to have deserted her if they live separate? The Act says that if the husband has neglected his wife by wilfully failing to provide her with reasonable maintenance and has so caused her to "leave and live separately and apart from him" she may apply for an order for maintenance, and nothing but adultery can disentitle her to such an order if the justices find the facts in her favour. If desertion, as used in sect. 4, was to be qualified by the words "without reasonable cause," sect. 6 of the Act was superfluous, for the wife's adultery would be a sufficient answer to her allegation of desertion. In any case the evidence which it was desired to tender was totally irrelevant, and had nothing to do with the desertion.

The PRESIDENT.—The question in this case turns upon the meaning of the word "desertion" used in sect. 4 of the Act of 1895. For the appellant it has been urged that the word is used in the same sense and with the same meaning that it has acquired in all the proceedings of this court, whilst for the wife it has been contended that the word has a separate and distinct meaning. In the cases that have been referred to by Mr. Le Bas the matter has been fully considered, and it has been made quite clear that desertion is not merely a cessation of cohabitation, but a cessation of cohabitation without reasonable cause. This court has always acted on that principle. If a wife brings a suit for restitution of conjugal rights no order will be made in her favour if she has been guilty of cruelty which does not amount to a matrimonial offence. The conduct of a wife may be such that it is intolerable for her husband to live with her. If, then, he leaves her, or if they begin to live apart, is there not some reasonable ground for his action? In such a case there is no desertion on the part of the husband. It seems to me absurd to suggest that there is a distinction between the Act of 1857 and the Act of 1895. If there is a reasonable excuse and a husband leaves his wife there is no desertion. Desertion is a continuing offence. It may commence on a certain date, and afterwards the husband may discover other facts and refuse to take his wife back. He may think that he has reasonable grounds for his refusal, and that whatever were the original reasons for the separation his subsequent knowledge of facts will place his conduct in a different light. In the present case the husband made certain discoveries after the 18th July 1902, and he desired on the hearing of the summons to lay the grounds for his conduct before the magistrates, and to point out to them that he was, in his opinion, fully justified in refusing to live with her. The magistrates declined to hear any evidence on the subject. They thought that after evidence had been given of the fact of desertion, adultery alone could be set up in answer to the wife's complaint. In that view I think the magistrates were distinctly wrong. They ought to have heard the evidence for what it was worth. Even after hearing it they may come to the same conclusion, and hold that the husband has been guilty of desertion. Upon that I do not express any opinion, for I have not read the letters in question. But that is not the point. What has to be decided is whether the husband had a reasonable cause for leaving his wife, and without hearing the whole of the evidence tendered the justices could not arrive at a proper decision upon the matter. The case must be remitted to them to hear the evidence.

BARNES, J.—I agree. It has been argued for the wife that the husband has no right to refuse, to live with his wife, and that he is guilty of desertion if he leaves her or causes her to leave him. If a wife were to beat her husband with a poker would he not have a reasonable excuse for leaving her? It has been urged that a husband's only excuse is adultery on the part of his wife. That is a wrong idea. Adultery is an excuse when desertion has been found. But what is desertion? It has the same meaning in the Act of 1895 as in the Act of 1857 and signifies desertion without reasonable cause. The case must be sent back.

Re DALLAS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Mortgage — Priority — Notice — Charges upon expectant legacy — Fund not in existence or under control of any person at date of creation of incumbrances — Notices given by incumbrancers on fund coming under control.

Where charges were created, during the lifetime of a testator, by a beneficiary upon his expectant legacy under the will of the testator—of which charges no effective notice could be given by any of the incumbrancers until the legacy charged came into existence and some person had control of it—it was held that the order of the dates at which notices were given, by the incumbrancers of their respective securities, to the legal personal representative of the testator, was sufficient to determine the priorities of the several incumbrancers, according to the principle of Johnstone v. Cox (45 L. T. Rep. 657; 19 Ch. Div. 17) and similar authorities; and that such priorities ought not to be regulated by reference to the dates of the securities themselves.

Decision of Buckley, J. affirmed.

ROBERT DALLAS, by his will dated the 7th July 1893, after directing the payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses gave and bequeathed to his son Frederick Dallas the sum of 10,000*l.*, and after a bequest of like amount to his daughter Emily Beedell, and other bequests, appointed his son Frederick Dallas, his son-in-law William Beedell, and Edgar Francis Jenkins executors of his will, and gave all the residue of his property to them upon the trusts and for the benefit of the persons therein mentioned.

Subsequently to the date of his executing his will the testator became of unsound mind; and by an order of the Court of Lunacy dated the 28th June 1898 a receiver was appointed of his estate.

Edgar Francis Jenkins died in the lifetime of the testator, on the 18th Jan. 1898, having by his will appointed Charles Elliott Edward Jenkins and Edward William Hansell executors and trustees thereof, but the latter renounced probate, and disclaimed the trusts of the will.

William Beedell also died in the lifetime of the testator, on the 21st Jan. 1899.

The testator died on the 24th Dec. 1902, without having altered or revoked his will.

At the date of the testator's death his estate consisted of moneys and investments either standing in court in Lunacy or under the control of the court.

On the 9th Jan. 1903 the testator's son Frederick Dallas renounced probate of the will, and on the same day by deed disclaimed the trusts thereof.

On the 4th March 1903 letters of administration with the will annexed of the personal estate of the testator were granted to his daughter Emily Beedell.

By an order of the Court of Lunacy dated the 27th March 1903 (but made on the 17th March 1903) it was ordered that the whole of the estate of the testator should be paid out and transferred to Emily Beedell as the legal personal representative of the testator.

On the 12th May 1903 Frederick Dallas was adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 28th May 1903 Emily Beedell paid into court, under the Trustee Act 1893, the sum of 9985*l.*, being the legacy of 10,000*l.* bequeathed to Frederick Dallas, less 15*l.* the costs of and relating to such payment.

It appeared that during the period from Jan. 1894 to April 1903 Frederick Dallas had created a great number of incumbrances upon the estate or interest of or to which he was or should or might become possessed or entitled under the will or intestacy of his father.

These incumbrances amounted in the aggregate to a sum largely exceeding the amount of the legacy of 10,000*l.* bequeathed to Frederick Dallas by the testator.

The will of the testator had been prepared by his solicitors, the firm of Brooks, Jenkins, and Co., of which Edgar Francis Jenkins was then a member, and which now consisted of Stanley Herbert Scott and Arthur Edward Heatley.

Among the incumbrances the most important were the following:

A charge, dated the 30th March 1896, consolidating mortgages of the 13th Jan. 1894, and a charge of the 18th May 1894, created in favour of Edgar Francis Jenkins; a charge, dated the 8th Jan. 1897, in favour of the British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Society; charges dated the 18th May 1897 and the 3rd Nov. 1898 in favour of Frederick Stuart; a charge dated the 28th April 1898, in favour of John Edward Evans; charges, dated the 15th June 1898, the 12th May 1899, the 13th Nov. 1899, and the 14th Dec. 1900, in favour of Stanley Herbert Scott and Arthur Edward Heatley; a charge dated the 23rd May 1900 in favour of the Staffordshire Financial Company Limited.

On the 9th Jan. 1903—i.e., before the grant of the letters of administration—Emily Beedell had received from Charles Edward Elliott Jenkins

(the sole executor of Edgar Francis Jenkins), the British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Society, Stanley Herbert Scott, Arthur Edward Heatley, and the Staffordshire Financial Company Limited notices of their claims with the dates of their respective securities (referred to in the judgment of Williams, L.J. as the "Brooks-Jenkins incumbrances")."

On the 5th March 1903—i.e., after the letters of administration had been granted—Emily Beedell received notices from the same parties.

On the 12th March 1903 Frederick Stuart, on his first hearing of the grant of administration, gave notice to Brooks, Jenkins, and Co., who were the solicitors acting for Emily Beedell, of his charges.

On the 17th March 1903, and on subsequent dates, Emily Beedell received notices of the incumbrances held by various other persons.

A petition was presented by Charles Elliott Edward Jenkins, the British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Society, Stanley Herbert Scott, and Arthur Edward Heatley, asking that it might be declared that the incumbrances in favour of the petitioners were entitled to priority over all other incumbrances created by Frederick Dallas on the fund in court; and that as between the petitioners their respective incumbrances ranked in the order of the date of the indentures creating them respectively.

The petition also asked that an account might be taken of the amounts due to the petitioners in respect of their respective incumbrances; that, if necessary, an inquiry might be ordered as to what incumbrances created by Frederick Dallas other than the incumbrances of the petitioners affected the legacy of 10,000*l.* and the fund in court; that, if necessary, an inquiry might be ordered as to what were the priorities of such last-mentioned incumbrances; and that, if necessary, an inquiry might be ordered as to what was due to the persons entitled to such last-mentioned incumbrances and by virtue thereof.

On the 4th July 1903 the petition came on to be heard before Byrne, J., when his Lordship ordered the following inquiries and accounts to be made and taken: An inquiry what incumbrances created by Frederick Dallas affected the legacy of 10,000*l.* and the fund in court; an inquiry what were the respective priorities of such incumbrances; an account of what was due to the respective parties entitled to such incumbrances under and by virtue of their respective securities; and the master was to be at liberty in case he should consider it convenient either for saving expense or otherwise to bring before the judge any question which might arise between any competing parties before making his certificate. And it was ordered that the further hearing of the petition should be adjourned, with liberty to apply.

On the 31st July 1903 a summons was taken out on behalf of the petitioners to proceed upon the order of the 4th July 1903.

The master before settling the certificate desired to have certain points of law determined by the judge.

The questions left for the judge were as to the four points of view taken by the different parties interested: (1) Whether the incumbrances all ranked in order of date; (2) whether they ranked in order of notice; (3) whether one creditor holding a charge could obtain priority over another of previous date of which the administratrix had received notice before she was appointed by giving notice before the other after the grant of the letters of administration; (4) whether the estate of Frederick Dallas was distributable among all the creditors pari passu.

The points of law came on for argument before Buckley, J., when his Lordship reserved judgment.

On the 18th Dec. 1903 the following judgment was delivered by

BUCKLEY, J.—On the 7th July 1893 Robert Dallas made his will. He appointed three executors, of whom his son Frederick Dallas was the survivor. He gave Frederick Dallas a legacy of 10,000*l.* The testator died on the 24th Dec. 1902. In the meanwhile—viz., the 28th June 1898—upon proceedings taken in lunacy, a receiver had been appointed of the testator's property and his personality was paid into court in Lunacy. In the interval between the date of the will in 1893 and the date of the testator's death in 1902, Frederick Dallas, the legatee, executed a very large number of charges upon his expectant legacy under his father's will. I suppose the fact was that the father was never likely to be again of sound mind; and of course Frederick Dallas had an expectancy in the event of the testator dying without altering the legacy which he had given by his will in 1893. I have a list of these charges. They are thirty in number, and they run from the 30th March 1896 down to the date of the testator's death, and after the testator's death, the last being in April 1903. I gather that Frederick Dallas, in point of fact, raised upon his expectations of this legacy a very much larger sum than the 10,000*l.* The father having, as I have already said, died in Dec. 1902, Frederick Dallas was his sole surviving executor, the two other executors having predeceased the testator. On the 9th Jan. 1903 Frederick Dallas renounced and disclaimed. On the 4th March 1903 administration with the will annexed was granted to Mrs. Beedell, the sister of Frederick Dallas. By an order made on the 17th but completed on the 27th March 1903, payment out of the funds standing in court in the lunacy was directed to her. On the 3rd or 4th May 1903 the funds in fact reached her hands, and she paid them into court under the Trustee Act 1893. On the 12th May 1903 Frederick Dallas was adjudicated bankrupt on a petition presented on the 24th Feb. 1903. The funds having come into court a petition was presented on the 5th June 1903 for payment out to the parties entitled. On the 4th July 1903 an order was made on that petition directing inquiries in order to work out the rights of these exceedingly numerous incumbrancers. The inquiries proceeded in chambers. The matter which has come before me is a reference by the master to the judge on points of law to be determined before he can settle his certificate. Now, the points of law which arise are as to the priorities of the incumbrancers, having regard to the various notices which they gave, if notice is necessary at all, for the purpose of determining the priorities under the circumstances which I have stated. The notices may be said to be of several classes: First, notice was given after the death of the testator on the 24th Dec. 1902 and before Frederick Dallas renounced probate on the 9th Jan. 1903 to a firm of Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, and Co., solicitors. At that date they were not solicitors for any person who could be described as the legal holder of the fund, and at no date, so far as I know, did any question arise with regard to that fund. Secondly, notice was given to Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, and Co. on behalf of certain clients to Mrs. Beedell before she obtained administration on the 4th March 1903. Thirdly, notice was given by Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, and Co. to Mrs. Beedell immediately that she obtained administration on the 4th March 1903. Such notice was given the next day. Lastly, if that has to be considered last of all, notice was given to the administration immediately after the date in May when the fund in fact reached her hands. The question I have to determine on the arguments which have been addressed to me seem now to be as follows: First, whether notice is necessary at all; and, secondly, if it be, then at what time and to whom ought the notice to be given? Now, at the date between the will in 1893 and the death in 1902 Frederick Dallas, of course, had no property as regards this legacy. He had merely a possibility or expectancy, if the testator died without revoking his will, that he would be entitled; an event which happened. But he had no property in the legacy at all. That an equitable incumbrance may be given upon a mere possibility or expectancy or upon future property of course is well settled. I will read from the judgment of Cotton, L.J. in Re Clarke; Coombe v. Carter (57 L. T. Rep. 823; 36 Ch. Div. 348), which shows the ground upon which plaintiff rests. His Lordship says (at p. 351 of 36 Ch. Div.): "It is clear that an assignment cannot at law pass future property, but it may be made effectual against future property on the ground that a court of equity will in a suitable case enforce it as a contract." Again, there is the well-known passage in Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Tailby v. Official Receiver (60 L. T. Rep. 162; 13 App. Cas. 523, at p. 543). Lord Macnaghten thus says: "It has long been settled that future property, possibilities, and expectancies are assignable in equity for value. The mode or form of assignment is absolutely immaterial provided the intention of the parties is clear. To effectuate the intention an assignment for value, in terms present and immediate, has always been regarded in equity as a contract binding on the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the subject-matter of the contract when it comes into existence, if it is of such nature and so described as to be capable of being ascertained and identified." That proposition I need scarcely say has not been contested at all at the bar in the present case. When you are dealing with a property such as that, it is of course obvious that there is no legal holder of the fund to whom the incumbrancer can give notice. There is no fund; therefore, of course, no legal holder of the fund. And it is impossible to give notice to anybody. There is a considerable body of cases of this description which arose in the old days before purchase by an officer of his commission in the army was abolished. An officer's commission was not his property which he could bind in any way. But it was something which by virtue of the system which prevailed as to the purchase of commissions might in an event be represented by money. There was an expectancy or a possibility of a fund coming to the officer if he retired from the army, or was gazetted out of the army. The result would be that a fund would come to him. What happened in such a case was this: The money in question was paid into the names of army agents and became the property of the officer at the moment when his retirement was accepted. At that moment the fund became his. Down to that moment he had nothing at all beyond the expectancy to which I have referred. Perhaps I had better mention the names of the cases that have been cited in the course of the arguments before me for the purpose of reference; there are eight of them. They are: Buller v. Plunkett (1 J. & H. 441); Yates v. Cox (17 W. R. 20); Boss v. Hopkinson (18 W. R. 725); Somerset v. Cox (33 Beav. 634); Calisher v. Forbes (25 L. T. Rep. 772; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 109); Addison v. Cox (28 L. T. Rep. 45; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 76); Johnstone v. Cox (43 L. T. Rep. 690; 16 Ch. Div. 571, affirmed on appeal, 45 L. T. Rep. 657; 19 Ch. Div. 17); and Roxburghe v. Cox (45 L. T. Rep. 225; 17 Ch. Div. 520). In all those cases what was distinguished was this: Before the moment at which the fund in the army agent's hands became, by the gazetting of the officer's retirement, his property, there was, as I have already remarked, no fund of which there was any legal holder at all. The fund became the officer's on the gazetting, with the result that the notices given to the army agents before the gazetting were perfectly useless and idle. It was not open to say that the army agents when the London Gazette appeared ought to have remembered the notice which they had received the previous day or the previous week. The previous notice was void altogether because it was not given to a person who was the legal holder of the fund. But immediately on the appearance of the London Gazette the equitable incumbrancers, if they were wise, took care to serve the army agents with notice. And the rule adopted was that all notices received on the same day ranked pari passu for this purpose, and as between them they went in date of priority of charge. Indeed, the practice went to this extent that, if notice was served after office hours on the day next preceding the publication of the London Gazette, that should be treated as good notice on the day that the London Gazette appeared, because it would be assumed that the parties who received it would open it the next morning. But, if it arrived previously, it was a bad notice and void. In all those cases it was held that the right of the incumbrancers was according to priority of date on which each notice was received after the London Gazette appeared, and the fund belonged to the officer. Now, from those cases it is perfectly obvious that two things follow: First, that where the subject of the equitable incumbrance is an expectancy or possibility notice is necessary, and priority goes according to the date of the receipt of the notice; and, secondly, that as between notices of even date the incumbrancers rank according to the priority of charge. That being so, there is no distinction at all between such a case as that and a case such as this. During the time that the testator was alive Frederick Dallas enjoyed in respect of his legacy the prospect of having a sum of money if something happened. So did the officer in the case I have referred to. Now, for the respondents

Re DALLAS.

I have heard an argument which is certainly not deficient in courage. I am told that all those cases are wrong, and are wrong because of two recent decisions in the House of Lords—in which those cases were not referred to or commented on or dealt with—and which have laid down principles that are inconsistent with the principles upon which those cases were decided. Now, among the learned judges who decided the earlier cases are found Page-Wood, V.C., James, L.J., Mellish, L.J., Sir George Jessel, M.R., and Lord Selborne—a formidable array of names if one is to say that the decisions of those learned judges were wrong. That, nevertheless, is the argument which I have heard. I will go on to deal with the two cases upon the authority of which it is now contended that I must say that the earlier authorities are all wrong. The first of them is Tailby v. Official Receiver (ubi sup.), to which I referred just now. Let me recall what the facts in Tailby v. Official Receiver (ubi sup.) were. Tailby was the assignee of certain book debts due from the firm of Wilson Brothers. He gave notice to the debtors. Subsequently the assignor became bankrupt; the debtors paid Tailby; the official receiver sued Tailby in the County Court, and after many vicissitudes, in which every court in succession reversed the court immediately preceding it, the official receiver failed in the House of Lords. The whole point argued and decided in Tailby v. Official Receiver (ubi sup.) was whether the property which was there referred to was so sufficiently identified as to be within the principles of Holroyd v. Marshall (7 L. T. Rep. 172; 10 H. of L. Cas. 191). But the question now before me did not arise in that case in any way whatever, and the House of Lords has said nothing about it. I think, therefore, that I have mentioned enough to show that Tailby v. Official Receiver (ubi sup.) has nothing to do with the present case. The other case is Ward v. Duncombe (69 L. T. Rep. 121; (1893) A. C. 369). Now, when the judgments in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.) are read, I think that it will be found that what was established there was this: That the doctrine of notice rests upon the principle that the equitable assignee ought to take such steps as will prevent the assignor from retaining the apparent ownership of the fund; and, secondly—if it be different, although I think it is only an application of the former principle—that the equitable assignee must take such steps as will give him a right in rem against the fund assigned, as distinguished from the right against the conscience of the assignor of the fund; and that that ought to be done by him to some extent at any rate, not necessarily, but so far as possible before taking possession of the fund. Now, Dearle v. Hall (3 Russ. 1) is, of course, a case which has been very often criticised, and it is criticised largely by Lord Macnaghten in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.), the case to which I have been referring. But Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) is indisputable law. Many judges have said that they will not extend it; but there it is. Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.) has left the doctrine of notice to perfect or complete or establish the title of the equitable assignee wholly untouched as it seems to me. Whether it has left it as resting so much as it was supposed to do upon a doctrine of negligence I am not clear, but the principles which it enunciates are those which I have endeavoured to express. If that be the whole effect of Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.)—and I think that it is the whole effect—how does that touch in any way the doctrine of the earlier cases as regards an equitable incumbrance on a possibility as decided in those earlier cases? I do not see that it touches it at all. The argument presented to me has been largely to this effect: At a moment when the equitable incumbrance is given the equitable incumbrancer could not give notice to a legal holder of the fund, because there is no fund in existence and no legal owner; ergo, he need never give notice to the legal holder of the fund when there is a fund in existence. It is sufficient to answer that that is in direct contravention to all that is decided in the earlier cases; and the earlier cases are, I think, good law. That, perhaps, is an expression which I scarcely ought to use. I do not need to say whether or not they are good law. It suffices for me to say that they are binding decisions absolutely untouched by anything which was decided in the House of Lords in the two cases to which I have referred. To put the argument which has been addressed to me on behalf of the respondents in a slightly different form, it runs thus: As has been said the equitable incumbrance upon an expectancy is only that thing which binds the conscience of the assignor, and it is argued that through the conscience of the assignor no one can get more than the assignor generously can give him; or, secondly—respecting what I have already stated—that at the date of the incumbrance there was no legal holder of the fund, and no notice therefore could be given to a legal holder at that time; ergo, no notice need be given at any time. For that last proposition a passage in particular was referred to in the judgment in Re Wyatt; White v. Ellis (65 L. T. Rep. 841; (1892) 1 Ch. 188), the case which was affirmed under the name of Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.). The passage referred to is at p. 207 of (1892) 1 Ch., and it runs thus: "The time of the taking of the subsequent charge, or more exactly the time when inquiry was or ought to be made of the trustees, and not the period of distribution, thus appears to be the critical moment." Now, the argument that rests upon that sentence is not, I think, a bad illustration of the fallacies into which you may fall if you allow yourself to read that sentence divorced from the context and divorced from the circumstances under which the language is used. That language was used without reference in any way to such a point as I am considering here, but with reference to a case where, of two trustees, one had a notice. And the question was whether, he having died, and having been succeeded by a new trustee, and the new trustee and the original trustee not knowing the equitable incumbrancer, he was entitled to say: "Well, the man who had notice from the man who gave notice is no longer a trustee, and therefore the doctrine does not apply." Directly you see that that was the circumstance under which the language was used, it becomes apparent that the principle is not applicable at all to a case like that which is now in question. In the case here there was, down to the death of the testator, no legal holder of the fund. At the death of the testator there was a legal holder. Ought you to give notice to the legal holder when there is a legal holder? Now, to that argument, which I have endeavoured to state again in a different form, the army agents' cases, of course, are a complete reply. The equitable assignee of the officer who gave his notice—if he was earlier in point of time with his notice—did through the conscience of his assignor get more than his assignor could properly have given him because he stepped in with the notice and then accepted priority. I therefore hold that notice in the present case is necessary. I pass on to consider what notice must be given, and to whom. As regards the person to whom notice must be given I will read a sentence from the judgment of Lord Selborne in one of the earlier cases—Addison v. Cox (28 L. T. Rep. 45; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 76, at p. 79)—to the effect that the notice must be a notice given to a person who is "bound by some contract or obligation existing at the time when the notice reaches him." The whole substratum of the army agents' cases was that the notice given to the army agents when they were not bound by any contract or obligation was altogether futile and useless. It was only a notice given when, by the gazetting of the officer out of the army, the army agents became the trustees for him. The notice, therefore, must be given to a person bound by some contract or obligation. Next, the notice if acquired in fact by the legal holder of the fund is operative even though it be obtained not by direct notice from the encumbrancer, but under such circumstances as that as a matter of business he would be taken to have known it. I read this from Lord Cairns in Lloyd v. Banks (L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 488, at p. 491): "If it can be shown that in any way the trustee has got knowledge of that kind—knowledge which would operate upon the mind of any rational man, or man of business, and make him act with reference to the knowledge he has so acquired—then, I think, the end is attained, and that there has been fixed upon the conscience of the trustee, and through that upon the trust fund, a security against its being parted with in any way that would be inconsistent with the incumbrance which has been created." Further, suppose that there are several trustees, notice to one of their number will be sufficient if he be not a trustee standing in such a position that it is his interest to conceal the notice. And this is none the less true because the question arises after that one who has received the notice is dead and when the survivor and the new trustee have not knowledge. It was decided Re Wyatt; White v. Ellis (65 L. T. Rep. 841; (1892) 1 Ch. 188)—in the House of Lords sub nom. Ward v. Duncombe (69 L. T. Rep. 121; (1893) A. C. 369)—that an effective notice is not displaced by any change of the trustees; so that, if notice be given, say, to all of three trustees, and they all cease to be trustees, and three other people become trustees who have no notice, the original notice would be good. That is the decision in Re Wasdale; Brittin v. Partridge (79 L. T. Rep. 520; (1899) 1 Ch. 163), decided by Stirling, J. But this last proposition is, it may be, subject to exception in the case which arose in Timson v. Ramsbottom (2 Keen, 35), upon which Lord Herschell commented in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.). If, however, the assignee be himself one of the trustees, and he is the only person who receives notice then, according to Browne v. Savage (4 Drew. 635), notice to him will not do. In Browne v. Savage (ubi sup.) Kindersley, V.C. says: "In the case where the assignor is himself one of the trustees, he being the only one of the trustees who has any notice or knowledge of the assignment which he has made, if he should afterwards apply to another person to advance him a sum of money on an assignment of his interest, concealing the fact of the prior assignment, such proposed assignee could not, by any caution in making inquiry of all the trustees, discover the fact of the prior assignment; for it is the interest of the trustee, who is the proposed assignor, to conceal the prior assignment; and the other trustees know nothing about it." I pass on to consider who were the persons who had notice, and who were the persons who ought to have had notice, on the facts of the case before me. Now the first proposition which it will be necessary to deal with is this: Frederick Dallas, the sole surviving executor, was himself the assignor, and, of course, he knew all of his own assignments. When the testator died was he or was he not a legal owner of the fund so that his knowledge operated in favour of all the equitable assignees as being within Lloyd v. Banks (ubi sup.)—knowledge which he had which would be effectual? Now the first proposition to deal with is this: Frederick Dallas, as I have said, renounced probate. What was the effect of his renunciation? The enactments 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 79, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, s. 16, are sections which deal as regards the former with the case of renunciation, and the latter the case of death of the executor or failure of the executor to appear and take probate when cited. As regards all those cases the earlier statute provides, and I will read sect. 79 as to renunciation (which is the relevant one here) that: "Where any person after the commencement of this Act renounces probate of the will of which he is appointed executor, or one of the executors, the rights of such person in respect to the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator and the administrator of his effects shall and may, without any further renunciation, devolve, and be committed in like manner as if such person had not been appointed executor." Now, upon that first ground, as it seems to me, the executor who subsequently renounced as the result of the renunciation stood from the first in such a position as that he was not for this purpose a legal holder of the fund. Leaving the statute and regarding it upon general grounds according to Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.), what you have to do is to give a notice to the person who has the disposition of the fund. You serve the legal holder because it is he who holds the purse strings and keeps the money. Now it seems to me that the executor who renounced never was a person who had the disposition of the fund. He could not have had the disposition of the fund except by intermeddling with the estate. If he intermeddles with the estate he cannot renounce. He therefore is a person who never had the disposition of the fund; and therefore he is not the person to whom a notice ought to be given. He never had the purse at his disposition and he would not be properly addressed. But, further, suppose that you serve the sole executor with a notice would it be his duty when an administration is subsequently granted to somebody else to hand on that notice to the person who would then be the legal holder of the fund and would that have a retrospective operation as if it had been served on the date of the renunciation by the renouncing executor? By that again I say that the renouncing executor can owe no duties at all to the estate. His position is this, that the testator has by his will nominated him to an office, and the tenure of that office no doubt comes to the executor not by virtue of the probate, but by virtue of the will. But he is not bound to take the office. The testator cannot impose it upon him against his wish. And if he refuses to take it then he is a person who refuses to have anything to do with the estate, and he cannot be a person who owes to the estate the duty of handing on to a legal personal representative, when subsequently constituted, notices which in his hands were of no value at all. Again, apart from this ground altogether, what was Frederick Dallas's position? He was the sole surviving executor and the assignor. Suppose that a notice to him under any circumstances could be effectual—effectual, I mean, as being a service on the legal holder of the fund. This question then arises, Where the sole legal holder is also the equitable assignor is the knowledge which he necessarily possesses, a knowledge which enures for the benefit of the equitable incumbrancers? It is but an application of the principle of Browne v. Savage (ubi sup.) to say that that cannot be so. Browne v. Savage (ubi sup.) lays down that if you give notice to one of several trustees, he being himself the assignor, that will not do. In the same way notice to a sole legal holder who is himself possessed of the fund will not do. On all these grounds it seems to me that Frederick Dallas had knowledge, and the fact that he had knowledge was not any notice at all for the purpose of protecting the equitable incumbrancers. Then, if he was not the person, who was the person to whom the notice could be given? The answer is easy. There came into existence for the first time a legal holder of this fund when on the 4th March 1903 administration with the will annexed was granted to Mrs. Beedell. I am not, in saying that, saying that there was in the interval no legal owner at all. The legal ownership must be somewhere, but it was not in Frederick Dallas. Whether it was in the Crown or the President of the Probate Division, as it would have been under the old law, I need not set myself to inquire. It was somewhere no doubt, but it was not in Frederick Dallas. It was not in any person who was served on the 4th March 1903, when Mrs. Beedell took out letters of administration. She was the legal owner, and she was, in my opinion, the person upon whom notice could effectually be served. Substantially that determines all the questions that have been argued before me. But I have to say a word or two with respect to some subsidiary arguments that have been addressed to me for the purpose of showing that I have not overlooked them. In the first place an argument was addressed to me by counsel for one of the incumbrancers, which was to this effect, that the notice to the administratrix after the administration does regulate the priorities except, so counsel said, that as against a person who has given notice before an administration a subsequent incumbrancer in date cannot by notice to the administratrix obtain priority. I took that down from the counsel, arguing the matter so that I might say that I was accurately representing his proposition. Counsel assented to it when I read it to him. I fail to see the argument in support of it. There was the case of Lloyd v. Banks (ubi sup.). I have looked into that case, and I fail to see that it has any bearing on the point discussed here. In that case no notice was given to a person who was not a trustee; nor was there any question argued as to what the effect of that would be. And I am myself unable to appreciate how a notice given to a person who is not the legal holder can, upon the principle I have endeavoured to explain, have anything to do with it. Another argument advanced was for another incumbrancer, by whom a notice was given on the 25th Jan. 1901—that is to say, during the testator's lifetime. Of course, such a notice would be perfectly idle. That is no good at all. But it was argued that if the administratrix after she became such heard of that previous notice in 1901 that would be a good notice, and there ought to be an inquiry to find out if that was so. I fail to see any ground whatever for that argument. It has been decided over and over again that a trustee being a person who is not the legal holder can have no notice at all. Another argument was that the first charge, which was executed after the testator's death, and of which notice was given to the legal personal representative, takes priority of everybody. I fail to see any ground for that contention at all. With previous incumbrancers the question is whether they have so given notice as to entitle them to avail themselves of it. The last argument was—that the fund did not actually reach the hands of the administratrix until early in May 1903, after the order for payment by the Court of Lunacy was made; and that until the fund reached her hands notice to her was ineffectual. That was argued upon the authority of a case of Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Langley (51 L. T. Rep. 284; 26 Ch. Div. 686; on appeal 54 L. T. Rep. 326; 32 Ch. Div. 460, at p. 473). The argument presented is that so long as the fund was in the Court of Lunacy notice to the trustee, the legal holder, was not sufficient, and a stop order ought to be obtained. Now, Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Langley (ubi sup.) was a case in which a fund was in the Court of Chancery and the Court of Chancery had the execution of the trusts or the administration of the fund. Under those circumstances the court may not be altogether incorrectly described as standing in the position of a trustee. What was held was that where a fund is so in court notice to the trustee alone is not sufficient; but that you must get a stop order also. Of course the distinction between that case and the present case is obvious. The Court of Lunacy is not executing a trust or administering the estate in any way. The Court of Lunacy is only a custodian of the property of the person who is, by reason of his unsoundness of mind, unable to control it himself. The moment that person dies the basis of the jurisdiction in Lunacy has gone. There is no lunatic, and the person who is left becomes entitled by devolution of the fund, and is for all purposes the owner and holder of the fund. The Court of Lunacy is in no sense a trustee in any way. Some of the parties have endeavoured to obtain priority and failed because the Court of Lunacy cannot give it them. Their argument also, I think, fails. I believe I have now travelled over the whole field, and it is a very large one, of the numerous authorities. The result is that I come to the conclusion that the priorities will rank according to the date of the notice given to the administratrix after the administration was granted, and I so declare. I will only add this: The respondents have argued—I will not say without reason—that in such circumstances it is very difficult for the equitable incumbrancers to protect themselves by notice. That is the difficulty which arose in the old cases of the army agents. It used to be the practice, I believe, to post a notice every day to the army agents in case by misfortune the fund should come into their hands without the incumbrancers being provided for. Each incumbrancer had to endeavour to be first in the field, or as early as anybody else. It is said truly enough that, inasmuch as the fund was created or became the property of the officer by the publication in the Gazette which was open to everybody, everybody had the means of knowing it, and therefore he could protect himself. It is said—I am not sure how far that is so—that in the case of the granting of letters of administration there is not the same facility of obtaining information. That may be so, but it appears to me that it has nothing to do with the question of law which I have to decide. If it be the law, as I hold it is, that an equitable assignee with a possibility of future priority can only secure himself to the enjoyment of his security by giving notice to the legal holder when there is one; he must meet that difficulty as best he can. He may have to return to the old practice of posting a letter daily. I declare that the priority of these incumbrancers will be according to the dates of the notices given by them respectively to the administratrix after administration was granted; and that, of course, in the case of notices received on the same day, they will rank in priority of the date of the charge.

From that decision Frederick Stuart now appealed.

Henry Terrell, K.C. and P. F. S. Stokes for the appellant.—The main question raised by this appeal is whether the priorities of the several incumbrancers are to be regulated by the dates of their respective securities or by the dates given by them respectively to the administratrix. From the observations of Lord Cairns in Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Company v. The Queen (32 L. T. Rep. 283; L. Rep. 7 E. & I. App. 496, at p. 506) will be seen the general rule applicable to priorities. The question is whether within those words the court can find, as Buckley, J. did, “something tangible and distinct, something which can have the grave and strong effect to accomplish the purpose for which it is said to have been produced,” in order to take away the pre-existing equitable title of the appellant, and so to deprive him of his priority. There was no negligence on the part of the appellant as to giving notice of his charges. The moment he heard of the grant of the letters of administration he gave notice to the administratrix. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J. referred to the “army agents’ cases,” such as Buller v. Plunkett (1 J. & H. 441), where notices were given to army agents by money-lenders daily who did not know when the money realised by officers upon the sale of their commissions would reach the agents’ hands. STIRLING, L.J.—Did not Ward v. Duncombe (69 L. T. Rep. 121; (1893) A.C. 369) deal with the question of negligence in giving notice of an incumbrance? Yes; and in that case the whole of the authorities upon the question of priorities were discussed. The decision there proceeded on Dearle v. Hall (3 Russ. 1), the foundation of which was negligence. Unless the present case comes within the doctrine of Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) the several incumbrancers must rank according to the dates of their respective securities. Lord Herschell in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.), at p. 376 of (1893) A. C., stated the judgment of Sir Thomas Plumer in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.), and that he relied on the law laid down in Ryall v. Rowles (1 Ves. 348). The question of notice can, we submit, have no application here. [WILLIAMS, L.J.—Is there any case in which it has been decided that a second incumbrancer who has not given notice takes priority over a first incumbrancer who has also not given notice in a case similar to that to which you are referring? Is not Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) a case of that kind? [WILLIAMS, L.J.—No. Certainly not. COZENS-HARDY, L.J. referred to Tailby v. Official Receiver (60 L. T. Rep. 162; 13 App. Cas. 523).] The object of the principle upon which notice gives priority was to do equity. Is this court going to apply that doctrine to enable one person to deprive another of a right of which he could not avail himself? [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Foster v. Cockerell (3 Cl. & Fin. 456, at p. 462).] None of the grounds referred to in the authorities can possibly apply where at the date of the incumbrance there is no fund in existence and no trustee of it. None of the competing incumbrancers can know that the fund has come under the control of some person. The rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) does not touch a case like that. No question of negligence can arise here. The foundation of that case be it what it may is quite different from what it is here. As regards the numerous “army agents’ cases,” referred to by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., the principle ones are the following:

Buller v. Plunkett, 1 J. & H. 441;

Webster v. Webster, 31 Beav. 393;

Somerset v. Cox, 33 Beav. 634;

Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire v. Cox, 16 L. T. Rep. 374;

[WILLIAMS, L.J.—Referred to Collyer v. Isaacs (45 L. T. Rep. 567; 19 Ch. Div. 342).] In Johnstone v. Cox (ubi sup.), there was a trustee the moment the fund came into existence. Therefore the fact that the moment that the incumbrancer gave notice to the army agents and thereby got there a priority does not affect the present case as the administratrix was not appointed until some time after the fund came into existence; and the assignment operates as soon as the fund comes into existence. It would be extending the rule to a state of circumstances to which it was never intended to apply if the principle of the army agents’ cases is held to govern the present case. They referred also, on the question of notice, to

As to the effect of renunciation of probate, see Williams's Executors and Administrators (9th edit., vol. 1. p. 233) citing 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 79. The words of that section are such that they do not cause the executor to cease to be an executor for all purposes, but he is the person to whom notice may be given of an incumbrance upon a legacy. The case of renunciation and appointment of an administrator is similar to the case of a new trustee being appointed. The person who gave the executor notice is entitled to priority. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Williams's Executors and Administrators, 9th edit., vol. 1. p. 250.] The case of Browne v. Savage (4 Drew. 635), cited by Buckley, J. upon the question of the effect of notice by an assignee to one of several trustees, was followed by Cozens-Hardy, L.J. (when Cozens-Hardy, J.) in Lloyd's Bank Limited v. Pearson, 81 L. T. Rep. 314; (1901) 1 Ch. 865.

They referred also to Willes v. Greenhill, 4 De G. F. & J. 147 cited in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.).

Buckmaster, K.C. and A. R. Macklin for the respondents, the petitioners; L. R. Ryland for the respondents, the Staffordshire Financial Company Limited; and Vaughan Williams and H. Marshall for the respondents, other incumbrancers, were not called upon to argue.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that the decision of Buckley, J. is quite right and ought to be affirmed. Really with regard to very nearly all the questions which have been argued before us on behalf of the appellant we are bound by authority. I wish in order to clear the ground first without giving details to shortly state sufficient to show how the question arises which we have to determine in the present case. [His Lordship summarised the facts of the case, and continued:] The incumbrances created by Frederick Dallas upon the fund which has come into existence and became his are in the aggregate very much larger than the fund itself. The result is that the question has arisen as to the priority of the several incumbrancers. On the 5th March 1903, the date of the grant of the letters of administration, notices were given to the administratrix of certain incumbrances which for brevity I will call "the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrances," for either Messrs. Brooke, Jenkins, and Co. or their clients were the incumbrancers. There was a much earlier incumbrance in point of date than some of the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrances—namely, one in favour of Stuart. There could be no effective notice given by an incumbrancer so as to enable him to obtain priority until the fund came into existence and there was some person who had control of the fund and to whom notice could be given. So we begin with this, that there could be no notice given during the lifetime of the testator. The next period with which we have to deal is the period between the death of the testator and the renunciation of probate by Frederick Dallas. With regard to that period we have not got to decide to-day whether there could be good notice so as to affect the priorities given to the executor appointed by the will, but who subsequently renounced probate before such renunciation, because it is plain on the authorities that if the person to whom the notice is given is himself the assignor both in the case of the incumbrance first created and also in the case of the later assignment that notice cannot be an effective notice. The reason of that is this: Whatever view one takes of the principle upon which notice is allowed to affect priorities is common to all the theories as to the principle on which notice is effective to alter priorities that notice is given upon the hypothesis that the trustee or other person who dominates legally the fund will give information to the person giving the notice if there is any prior incumbrance in existence. And it is plain that if it is a case in which there is only one such trustee or person controlling the fund, and he has made the first assignment, it is futile to give him notice of the second assignment at all, because it is his obvious interest to conceal from the puisne incumbrancer the first incumbrance which he has made. If he were aware of the first incumbrance he might refuse to advance money on the security of the second assignment. We can dispose of this part of the case at once by referring to a case which Buckley, J. mentioned in his judgment of Browne v. Savage (4 Drew. 635). That was a case in which the actual question which had to be decided was whether a notice to one of several trustees—that one being the assignor—was a sufficient notice, and it was held that it was not a sufficient notice. It was so held on the ground that it was his interest to conceal from the person giving the notice the very fact the discovery of which, if it existed, was the object of the notice. I thought at first, when the case was cited to us, that the ground of the decision was that the assignor would be likely to conceal the fact of his incumbrance from his fellow trustees. But when one comes to look more fully into the report of the case, and particularly at p. 640 of 4 Drew., one sees that the object of the concealment referred to by Kindersley, V.C. was not concealment from the other trustees, but concealment of the fact of the earlier incumbrance from the person who was invited to make an advance upon a second mortgage. That this is so is to my mind made very plain by the observations of my brother Cozens-Hardy in Lloyd's Bank Limited v. Pearson (81 L. T. Rep. 314; (1901) 1 Ch. 865). That also, like Browne v. Savage (ubi sup.), was a case where several trustees had control of the fund; but it is the principle which was dealt with by Cozens-Hardy, J. That I propose to refer to, and it is dealt with on p. 873 of (1901) 1 Ch. He says: "It would be whittling away the rule, and indeed would be making it a mere trap, if it were to be held that the knowledge which an assignor trustee has of his own incumbrance is sufficient to give the assignee priority against a subsequent incumbrancer who gives due notice to all the trustees. This, I take it, was the view of Kindersley, V.C." The result of these authorities, to my mind, is this, that inasmuch as notice to or knowledge of a sole assignor-trustee is not an effective notice to operate upon priorities, we may dismiss at once from this case all considerations of the knowledge of Frederick Dallas, the named executor who subsequently renounced probate. Even if there had been an express notice to him, it would not have been an operative notice for this purpose. When one passes from this and looks to see when the next notice was given, one finds that no other notice was given by any other incumbrancer at all until after the grant of letters of administration to Mrs. Beedell. That was on the 4th March 1903, and notice was given to her by the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrancers on the 5th March 1903 and any notice which was given by Stuart was given several days subsequently to that. In that state of things, therefore, the question which we have to answer here is, ought those of the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrances which in point of date of creation were subsequent to Stuart's incumbrance to take priority of his incumbrance? All that are of these incumbrances have all got is an equitable title, and their equities would in the ordinary course be enforced in order of date. But the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrances have been the first to give notice of their incumbrances. The ground on which counsel for the appellant sought to argue that that notice ought not to give any priority was this: He said that the whole principle upon which giving notice is allowed to affect priorities was that those who have not given notice have been guilty of some neglect of duty; and that if that be so, it cannot be said here that Stuart had been guilty of any neglect of duty whatever, because he could not have given notice during the lifetime of the testator. That so far as Frederick Dallas—the assignor and named executor—is concerned he could not have given any effective notice to him; and that therefore the first time at which he could have given an effective notice was upon the grant of the letters of administration, and he could not tell when that was to take place, and could not prevent the Brooks-Jenkins incumbrancers from giving the first notice, as it was through their solicitors that application was made for the grant of the letters of administration, which were granted to Mrs. Beedell. I agree so far with counsel for the appellant that there is no reason to attribute any negligence to Stuart. But the answer is that that is not the true principle to be applied. The true principle has been determined once and for all by the case of Ward v. Duncombe (69 L. T. Rep. 121; (1893) A. C. 369). It seems to me that that case decides that the principle which has been suggested by counsel for the appellant in his argument as the ground on which notice when given has been allowed to have the effect which it is allowed to have upon priorities is not the true principle. That case has been a good deal discussed in the course of the argument here, and I do not propose to go into it at any length. But if one turns to the observations of Lord Macnaghten (at p. 390 of (1893) A. C.) one finds the following: "It may perhaps be doubted whether the views of Sir Thomas Plumer in Dearle v. Hall (3 Russ. 1) were quite correctly appreciated in Foster v. Cockerell (3 Cl. & F. 456)—that was a case in the House of Lords—" which gives the go-by to all considerations founded upon the conduct of the parties. But however that may be, Foster v. Cockerell (ubi sup.) unquestionably lays down that the rule known as the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) is independent of any consideration of the conduct of the competing assignees, where the assignee second in date has no notice of the earlier assignment. Priority in such a case depends simply and solely on priority of notice." I cannot imagine any words which could more clearly lay down the principle upon which these notices are supposed to operate. They operate independently of any consideration of conduct of the competing assignees and priority of incumbrance depend simply and solely upon the priority of notice. It is true that subsequently Lord Macnaghten goes on to say (at p. 394 of (1893) A. C.): "My Lords: I have made these observations, not for the purpose of impugning the authority of the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.). The rule is settled law. But it seems to me that when your Lordships are asked to extend the rule to a case not already covered by authority, it is proper to inquire into the principles upon which the rule is said to be founded. For the reasons which I have already given I do not think that those principles are so clear or so convincing that the rule ought to be extended to a new case." Having said that, I think that I ought not to occupy any time by referring to the arguments or to the opinions of the Law Lords in the case of Foster v. Cockerell (ubi sup.) to show that Lord Macnaghten's view of what was decided in that case is perfectly accurate further than to say this: That when one looks at those arguments it is perfectly obvious that the contention of the counsel for the appellants in that case was almost identical with the contention of counsel for the appellant in this case; and their contention was really answered by the court holding that the rule known as the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) was a rule to the effect and based on the principle stated by Lord Macnaghten in his judgment in Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.). Having said that, I have now disposed of the principal argument in this case. But there is a word or two more to be said, because counsel for the appellant were relying rather on what Lord Macnaghten said with regard to not extending the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.). They suggested that in the present case there was no fund and no trustee at all until after the death of the testator and that after the fund came into existence there was no person to whom an effective notice could be given. And they said, therefore, that we should be extending the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) if we allowed it to apply to such a case as this. That contention is really completely answered by what are commonly known as, and what are still called for short, "the army agents' cases." It is quite plain that in those cases there was a time during which there was no trustee to whom a notice could be effectively given, and yet the result of those cases was that a notice given when there came into existence such a person was held to be a good notice effective to alter priorities. I think that there is no other point which we have to deal with in order to dispose of this case, and I have only to say that, in my opinion, the judgment of Buckley, J. ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

STIELING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. The question to be determined here is whether the rule laid down in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) is applicable to the present case. The rule is stated by Lord Macnaghten in Ward v. Duncombe (at p. 381 of (1893) A. C.) thus: "That an assignee of an equitable interest in personal estate without notice of an existing prior assignment may gain priority, simply by the act of giving notice to the person who has legal dominion over the fund before notice is given by the earlier assignee." It has been contended before us that that rule ought not to be applied to a case where the earlier assignee has not been guilty of any negligence in giving notice. But what was said by Lord Macnaghten in Ward v. Duncombe (at pp. 390, 391 of (1893) A. C.), cited by my Lord, appears to me entirely to negative that argument. It is quite true that Lord Macnaghten there points out that there is great difficulty in stating exactly the principle upon which the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) was established, and at least he warns those who have to apply that rule against extending it to cases not covered by that authority. The question, then, which we have to consider in the present case is whether this case is covered by that authority. If so, we have to apply that rule. It may be said possibly that it is not so covered. There is no case reported which is in its facts entirely like the present. But, in my opinion, in principle it is covered by the army agents' cases, and particularly by the principle stated by Bacon, V.C. in Johnstone v. Cox (ubi sup.), the decision in which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. At that time, in accordance with the law that then applied to the sale of commissions in the army, the Regulation of the Forces Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 86), an officer when he retired from the service was entitled to certain money usually called "purchase money for his commission." It was paid by the Government to army agents, and it was placed on deposit and could not be paid to the officer until his retirement was gazetted. In that case the incumbrancer who was first in date gave notice of his charge to the army agents after the money had been paid to them, but before notice of the officer's retirement appeared in the Gazette. The second and third incumbrancers gave notice the day after the retirement was gazetted, and then the first incumbrancer in point of date gave another notice five days after the notice in the Gazette. It was held that the order of priority of the incumbrancers was—first the second, then the third, and then the first; so that the second and third incumbrancers, by giving notice after the fund was in the hands of the agents as agents for the officer before the first, gained priority over the first incumbrancer. What happened here was that Frederick Dallas executed several assignments of his expectancy. At the death of the testator he was himself sole executor of the will, and no notice was in fact given while that state of things existed. He renounced his executorship, and letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to his sister. Then notices were given to her by some of the incumbrancers on the 5th March 1903, and on the 12th March notice was given by Stuart, another incumbrancer. Now, the question is whether the principle of Johnstone v. Cox (ubi sup.) does not apply to the facts of this case, and it seems to me that it does, and that it applies in this way—that although at the time when the incumbrances were created there was no person who had legal control of the fund, yet the position was altered the moment when a person came into existence who had legal control of the fund and to whom effective notice could be given. Here there was no person who had control over the fund until the grant of the letters of administration, and the fact that at the time of the death of the testator there was no one who had legal dominion over the fund does not make any difference. It was said that the distinction between this case and the army agents' cases was that in those cases directly the fund came into existence there was a person who had control over it to whom notice could be given, while in this case there was not; but, in my opinion, that is a matter of detail and does not make any difference. Then, as regards the point that Frederick Dallas was himself the executor and that the position was the same as where notice of an incumbrance has been given to a trustee who has died or retired and ought not to be prejudiced by the fact that there is an appointment of a fresh trustee who is not aware of the notice already given and receives a fresh notice. I agree with what has been said by my Lord on this point. I only say that we are not now deciding whether notice to an executor who does not act and renounces is of any value whatever. I should, presumably, be very slow to hold that it was.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with what has been held by Buckley, J., and I am so entirely satisfied with the reasons assigned by him for his decision, and also with what has been said by my brethren, that I shall not occupy more than a few minutes in giving my judgment. It is not open to us since Ward v. Duncombe (ubi sup.) to do otherwise than say that the rule in Dearle v. Hall (ubi sup.) is independent of the conduct of the incumbrancers. It is also clearly settled that the rule applies although there was no trust fund and no trustee in existence at the time of the several assignments. The army agents' cases are only intelligible on that view. Johnstone v. Cox (ubi sup.) was a clear decision on the point. The matter was not elaborately dealt with either by Bacon, V.C., or by the Court of Appeal, in that case, but it had been dealt with before in Calisher v. Forbes (25 L. T. Rep. 772; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 109), and the principle was recognised by Lord Selborne in Addison v. Cox (28 L. T. Rep. 45; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 76) in 1872, so that it is not open to us to reconsider it. Therefore there is only one point left. It was said that Frederick Dallas as assignor had knowledge—as of course he had—of his own incumbrances, and that the knowledge which he possessed of his own incumbrances, he being an executor named in the will, must be regarded as equivalent to a notice entitling the assignees to priority in order of date. I do not agree. It seems to me that the knowledge of the assignor is an entirely different thing from the knowledge obtained by notice given by the assignee to the person who has control of the fund. Under these circumstances it is not necessary, therefore, to decide whether notice to an executor who renounces and disclaims has or has not any force or validity. But, speaking for myself, I should require a great deal of argument to induce me to accede to the proposition submitted to us in the present case on that point.

BORTHWICK V. ELDEBSLIE STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Monday, Jan. 25.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER, L.J.)BORTHWICK V. ELDEBSLIE STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Ship—Bill of lading—Construction—Exceptions —Damage to goods—Unseaworthiness—Liability of shipowner.

Frozen meat was shipped on a steamer under a bill of lading, which contained two clauses relating to exceptions. The first clause, printed in Roman type, provided: "Neither the ship nor her owners shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any cause whatsoever, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not." The second clause, printed in small italics, provided: "The act of God . . . and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz. . . . or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull . . . or otherwise (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded or the commencement of the voyage) . . . if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness."

The vessel, being tainted with carbolic acid, was not in a fit condition to carry the meat when it was shipped, and the meat was thereby damaged during the voyage. If reasonable care had been taken to cleanse the ship before the meat was shipped the damage would not have occurred.

Held (reversing the judgment of Walton, J.), that, reading the two clauses together, the shipowner was not exempted from liability for damage caused by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Walton, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants damages for breach of contract and of duty in and about the carriage of frozen meat by sea.

The meat was shipped on the defendants' steamship Nairnshire at Melbourne, Australia, to be delivered at London, under several bills of lading, all in the same form, by which it was acknowledged that the meat had been shipped in good order and condition.

The plaintiff was the indorsee of the bills of lading.

The Nairnshire was fitted with refrigerating chambers for the purpose of carrying frozen meat. Before the voyage in question she had made two voyages with cargoes of horses, which were carried in different parts of the vessel and 'tween decks. For the purpose of cleansing the vessel whilst she was carrying the horses, and in order to disinfect her for the purpose of carrying frozen meat, a quantity of carbolic acid was used.

The bills of lading were headed "Refrigerating

Bill of Lading," and contained two clauses relating to exceptions.

The first clause was printed in Roman type and was as follows:

Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the masters, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods, or any part thereof, considered necessary on account of decomposition or otherwise.

The second clause was printed in small italics and was as follows:

The act of God, the King's enemies, pirates, robbers or thieves on land or sea (but not pilferage), arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, or people, riots, strikes, lock-outs, or other labour disturbances, or delay or hindrance caused directly or indirectly thereby and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz., insufficiency in packing or in strength of packages, loss or damage from coaling on the voyage, rust, vermin, breakage, leakage, drainage, sweating, evaporation, or decay, resulting from bad stowage or otherwise, or from the breakage or flow of or from contact with the urine, manure water, or drainage from horses, cattle, sheep, or other animals carried on the said ship or from their stalls, however caused, or otherwise howsoever; injurious effects of other goods, whether arising from bad stowage or otherwise; effects of climate, insufficiency of ventilation, or temperature of holds; risk of craft, of transshipment, and of storage afloat or on shore; fire on board, in hulk, in craft, or on shore; rain, hail, snow, frost, or ice; explosion, barratry, jettison; collision, whether with another ship or any other obstacle; stranding, lying upon, or touching the ground; perils of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind, or howsoever caused; whether or not any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners or charterers; whether on board the said ship or on shore, or on board any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or for whose acts they would otherwise be liable whether such act, omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment shall have occurred before or after the commencement of or during the voyage, or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers or by or from any accidents to or defects latent or otherwise in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage), or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness.

The plaintiff contended that the clause in Roman type must be read with and be limited by the clause in small type, and that the defendants were not protected from liability because reasonable means had not been taken to provide against unseaworthiness.

BORTHWICK v. ELDESLIE STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

The defendants contended that the clause printed in Roman type protected them from any liability for the damage to the meat caused by the vessel being tainted with carbolic acid, and that it was not limited by the clause in small type.

The action was tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the plaintiff.

Carver K.C. and D. C. Leck for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 9, 1903.—WALTON, J.—This is an action in which the plaintiff asks for a declaration that he is entitled to recover damages in respect of damage to a certain cargo of frozen meat which was shipped under bills of lading which are dated in Dec. 1901, and of which the plaintiff is indorsee, and he alleges the property in the goods passed to him by the indorsement. The case raises a question of construction of the bill of lading and a question of fact, and although my decision in this case will not depend upon my findings of fact, it will, no doubt, be convenient, as I have heard the evidence, to state what conclusion I have arrived at upon the question of fact. The cargo was shipped on the defendants' steamer called the Nairnshire at Melbourne, and was, as I have said, a shipment—not a full cargo—of frozen mutton. On the two voyages preceding the voyage in question upon which the mutton was carried, the Nairnshire had carried horses for the Government to South Africa, one voyage, I think, from Fiume to South Africa, and the second voyage from Australia to South Africa. On those voyages the horses were carried in different parts of the ship, but, amongst other parts, in the 'tween decks. For the purpose of those voyages a quantity of carbolic acid had been shipped before the commencement of the first of the voyages. The quantity was admitted—there were eighty five-gallon drums shipped, and of those drums a considerable quantity was made use of. After completing the second voyage with the horses the vessel went to Australia, and got orders on arrival in Australia to load frozen meat at various Australian ports. At Sydney the holds and the 'tween decks were cleaned out, and for this purpose a quantity of carbolic acid and chloride of lime was used to sweeten or disinfect the bilges. At any rate it is admitted by the defendants that it was used to an extent for that purpose. On the two voyages with horses it is also admitted by the defendants that carbolic acid to some extent—to what extent we do not know—had been used for the purpose of sweetening or disinfecting the stalls or spaces which were occupied by the horses, and, as I have said, horses were carried in the 'tween decks. The vessel was cleaned out at Sydney and then proceeded to other ports in Australia before going to Melbourne, where the frozen meat, the damage to which is in question in this case, was shipped. At Townsville, which was one of the ports at which the vessel called, all the carbolic acid that was left on board the vessel was landed with an exception—two or three drums (I think three) were kept on board by the chief engineer for the purpose of sweetening the engine-room. These three drums were kept during the voyage in question—that is the voyage home with frozen meat—in the engine-room, and

I think it is reasonably clear, and I do not think it is disputed, that those drums had nothing to do with the damage which it was afterwards found the frozen meat had sustained. More than twenty drums of carbolic acid had been used for one purpose or another in the course of the two voyages with horses, or in cleansing and disinfecting the ship at Sydney before the frozen meat was shipped. With the exception of the three drums in the engine-room and what was actually in the ship, that is what remained in the bilges or wherever else the carbolic acid may have been used, no carbolic acid was left on board the vessel. The vessel proceeded to Melbourne, and at Melbourne the frozen meat in question was shipped. With that frozen meat and other cargo the vessel made her voyage from Australia to this country, calling at the Cape, and at Durban, and at Cape Town discharged a quantity of cargo. I do not think it is necessary for me upon this question of fact to go very much further into the details. I have considered the evidence which I have heard and I have considered all that was said on both sides upon this question, and it seems to me that there is nothing in the world to show that any kind of accident occurred during the voyage to cause the frozen meat to become tainted by the smell of carbolic acid. I am satisfied that if the frozen meat was tainted by the smell of carbolic acid it must have arisen from a taint in the ship or from carbolic acid in the ship at the time the ship sailed from Melbourne. I know there are some difficult things to explain; I do not need to dwell upon them; I have not forgotten them, but it is sufficient for me to say that I have arrived at the conclusion that nothing happened in the course of the voyage, independently of the condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, to cause a taint to the frozen meat, or to cause the damage which is complained of in this action. The vessel arrived, and I find as a fact that the meat in question on arrival was found to be tainted with the smell of carbolic acid and was damaged. I have not to say anything as to the amount of damage, but I find as a fact that the meat was damaged by having become tainted during the voyage with the smell of carbolic acid. I find, as I have said already, that that arose from the condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, and I further find that if proper care, skill, and attention had been paid to the cleansing and preparation of the ship before she started on her voyage from Melbourne, the damage would not have occurred. I think that sufficiently disposes of the questions of fact, and expresses the conclusions at which I have arrived upon the material questions so far as they are questions of fact. As I have said, there is another question, and that is a question of construction of the bill of lading under which the frozen meat in question was shipped. It is a bill of lading which is headed "Refrigerator Bill of Lading," and it contains two clauses which may be called exception clauses—one of them is in larger print, and the other in smaller print. I do not attach much importance to the difference of type. I will only say this, that the clause which is in larger print, and is more legible, is not of the less importance at any rate on that account. But I deal with the clauses themselves. The clause in the larger type is a very far-reaching clause. It contains exceptions of the widest possible kind, and it seems to me to be perfectly plain and easy to understand. It says this: "Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods, or any part thereof, if considered necessary on account of decomposition or otherwise." Applying that to the present case, the damage here arose from a defect; that is to say, a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage, the defect being the taint in the ship—the fact that the ship was impregnated with the smell of carbolic acid, or was carrying carbolic acid in such a way as to taint the cargo and, therefore, I think the damage comes clearly within the words of this clause in the larger type. It was damage to the cargo arising, not from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, but certainly within the words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," and it arose from a defect which existed at the commencement of the voyage, or at the time of shipment of the goods. It was the consequence of a neglect or default on the part of the crew, notwithstanding that it was a defect arising at the commencement of the voyage. And, the defect arising from the neglect or fault of the crew, it seems that if this clause in the larger type stood alone it would be perfectly plain that the shipowners had in unambiguous language protected themselves from liability arising from such defect. But now it is said that the clause in the larger type must be read together with the clause in the smaller type, and that the effect of reading the two clauses together is to qualify and cut down the extent and effect of the first clause, which is the clause in the larger type. Coming to the clause in the smaller type, in the first place, reading it through, one is struck with this—that it refers to a great many things, possible causes of damage and matters which do not seem at any rate very appropriate to a bill of lading for the carriage of carcases of mutton. It is a very long clause; it is very much more verbose than the clause in large type. It contains a longer enumeration of excepted perils in detail, and then that enumeration of excepted perils—which I need not read, and which is very long—is followed by these words: "Whether or not any of the perils, causes or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners or charterers, whether on board the said ship, or on shore, or on board any other ship," and so on. I just stop to observe that in this long clause in the smaller type the negligence clause, to begin with, is much more limited than the negligence clause in the larger type, because the negligence clause in the smaller type is a negligence clause which is limited to the negligence of the persons in the employment of the ship bringing about any of the enumerated perils which are enumerated separately and particularly; whereas the negligence clause in the larger type is a perfectly general one, applying to loss arising in consequence of any negligence of persons in the employment of the shipowner. Returning to the clause in the small type, after the negligence clause, which is limited in the way I have mentioned, there come certain general words which add something to the perils which have been enumerated in detail, and they are these: "Or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers." I may say in passing I cannot find that the negligence clause in the small type refers to these other causes; it seems to refer only to perils which are enumerated in detail. I only point that out as going to show that the negligence clause in small type is more limited than the negligence clause in the larger type. With regard to these general words, I may point out that in the small type the general words which sweep in other causes are these: "Any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers." In the clause in the larger type the general words are not so limited at all, but they are: "Loss arising from any other cause whatsoever." Then comes the clause with regard to the seaworthiness, in the small type: "Or by or from any accidents to or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage) or insufficiency of coals at the commencement, or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." So that the exception with regard to seaworthiness in the small type is no doubt qualified in that way—that is to say, the shipowner is not to be liable for defects or other losses arising from defects existing at the commencement of the voyage if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness. So it is obvious that the clause in small type, although, as I have said, much longer, is in reality very much narrower and much more limited than the clause in the larger type. The question is whether I am to restrain the plain sense of the first clause, the more general one, by reading with it the longer clause in small type—whether I am to say that the wider clause is to be cut down by the narrower clause, or whether I am to say that the narrower clause is to be extended by the more extended clause. It seems to me the plain common sense is that the clause in the larger type has been put in for the express purpose of giving a wider scope to the narrower clause in the small type. It seems to me a most unnatural reading of this bill of lading to say that the clause in large type is cut down by the clause in the smaller type—I am not saying on account of the size of the type, but for the reasons which seem to me fairly obvious. The shipowner has had his doubts about this very long and somewhat complicated clause in small type, and to make the matter clear he has inserted a perfectly plain, intelligible, but very far-reaching clause, which is the clause in the larger type, and I think that must prevail. That being so, as the loss does fall within the exception expressed in the clause in the larger type, which I think is the governing clause, I think the shipowners are exempt from liability in this case, and therefore there must be judgment for the defendants.

BORTHWICK v. ELDERSLIE STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the appellant.—The decision of the learned judge, that the defendants were protected from liability by the provisions of the large print clause was wrong. Even if that clause stood alone in the bill of lading, it would not protect the shipowner from liability for this damage. The learned judge has found as a fact that the damage was caused by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel at the time the meat was shipped, and not by any failure or breakdown of the machinery or insulation. The prima facie construction of that clause is that it applies only to something happening during the voyage and that it does not protect the shipowner from liability caused by the ship being unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. The shipowner is bound to provide a ship which is seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and this clause does not exempt him from that obligation:

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. 333; 3 App. Cas. 72;

Tattersall v. National Steamship Company, 50 L. T. Rep. 209; 12 Q. B. Div. 297.

The words "or from any other cause whatsoever" in this clause must be construed as referring to matters ejusdem generis with the specifically enumerated perils—that is, failure or breakdown of machinery, &c.—and not as wide general words intended to include every kind of peril:

Richardsons v. Samuel and Co., 77 L. T. Rep. 479; (1898) 1 Q. B. 261.

The large print clause and the small print clause must be read together as far as possible, and, when they are so read together, the true construction of the document plainly is that the shipowner is not exempt from liability for damage caused by unseaworthiness unless reasonable means have been taken to provide against unseaworthiness. The learned judge has found as a fact that reasonable means were not taken to provide against unseaworthiness, and therefore the defendants are not protected. The vessel was not in a fit condition to receive and carry a cargo of this kind, and therefore was not seaworthy:

Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes, 73 L. T. Rep. 141; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550.

If a shipowner wishes to except the implied warranty of seaworthiness, he must do so in clear and unambiguous language:

Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company, 88 L. T. Rep. 428; (1903) 1 K. B. 750;

Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co., 89 L. T. Rep. 378; (1903) 2 K. B. 378.

It cannot be said that, in any view of this bill of lading, the shipowner has clearly protected himself against this liability.

Carver, K.C. and D. C. Leck for the respondents.—The learned judge rightly held that the large print clause was the governing clause, and was not cut down or qualified by the small print clause. The small print clause only limited the liability of the shipowner for unseaworthiness in a qualified manner, and it was a very long clause not too clearly expressed. The shipowner, therefore, inserted the large print clause in order to clearly protect himself by using the widest possible language. The clause containing the lesser protection cannot control or qualify the clause which gives the larger protection. By the large print clause the shipowner is protected from liability for "loss or damage arising from . . . or any other cause whatsoever." Those words clearly cannot be intended to refer only to matters ejusdem generis with breakdown or failure of machinery. They are clear and unambiguous words, exempting the shipowner from liability for any damage arising from anything existing at the commencement of the voyage. Even if the words of the large print clause are to be construed as referring only to breakdown or failure of machinery, &c., this damage was caused by failure of the insulation, for if the meat had been properly insulated it could not have been tainted.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C.—The learned judge has found that there was no failure or breakdown of the insulation. If there had been, the meat would have become putrid instead of being tainted with carbolic acid.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—With all deference to the weighty opinion of Walton, J. in a case of this kind, I have come to the conclusion that in this case he has overlooked and not given effect to certain broad considerations which must, I think, be borne in mind in construing commercial documents, and, indeed, all documents which have to be considered from a legal and business point of view. In my opinion, it is true in the case of a bill of lading, as in the case of other documents, that where there are a number of clauses they are as far as possible to be read together, as being consistent with one another, and that a clause is not to be treated as being mere surplusage, or as inoperative, unless the language of the document leads to the conclusion that it cannot be read consistently with rest of the document. There is one other general rule of construction to which I think the learned judge did not give sufficient attention, which I will state in the language of Williams, L.J. in his judgment in the case of Rathbone Brothers and Co. v. MacIver, Sons, and Co. (89 L. T. Rep. 378; (1903) 2 K. B. 378). In that case Williams, L.J. said: "With reference to the carriage of goods by sea, the law implies certain warranties on the part of the shipowner. It puts upon him certain obligations which will always bind him, unless there are in the contract clear and express words which without ambiguity relieve him from that which I may call his common law obligations." I think that Romer, L.J., in that case, was referring to that principle when he said: "Shipowners have been for a long time endeavouring to limit the general liability cast upon them by law as carriers by sea by inserting special exceptions, without going the length of excepting their liability in respect of the warranty of seaworthiness, and they have been, as I understand, from time to time extending the special exceptions. I think, however, I am right in saying that as a principle of construction the warranty of seaworthiness will be held not to have been excepted unless it plainly appears that it was intended to except it. In other words, the court will not readily infer an exception of that warranty." It seems to me that those statements in the judgments in the Court of Appeal lay down in the clearest possible language the principles which were applied in many earlier cases. In the present case I think that the learned judge has not given sufficient effect to the fact that the small print clause undoubtedly deals with unseaworthiness. Mr. Carver has argued that the small print clause leaves the matter of unseaworthiness where it was, except to the extent to which it limits it. In other words, there being a warranty of seaworthiness, the small print clause provides that the shipowner excepts damage caused by or from any accidents to, or defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage), or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." Therefore I accede to the first part of Mr. Carver's argument, that the small print clause leaves the warranty of seaworthiness where it was except to the extent that it affords further protection to the shipowner by providing that, if reasonable means have been taken to prevent unseaworthiness, the shipowner shall be protected. I am, however, unable to follow the other part of Mr. Carver's argument, that the large print clause, in the construction of which there is undoubtedly considerable difficulty, is intended to be an overriding clause exempting the shipowner from liability for unseaworthiness, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or not, and that by reason of the words, "from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage, or at the time of the shipment of the goods or not," the shipowner is protected in this case notwithstanding the limited protection given to him by the small print clause. I am unable to come to the conclusion that, construed fairly and with every wish to give the fullest possible effect to the exception, the large print clause further limits the warranty of seaworthiness beyond the limitations contained in the small print clause. I will not repeat the reasons which have been given why the two clauses should as far as possible be read together as being consistent with each other and operative. The large print clause says: "Neither the steamer, nor her owners, nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under the bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention." Then, it is very material to observe that the clause proceeds: "Nor for the consequence of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods or any part thereof." It is, therefore, quite plain that this clause cannot be considered as having been framed to put in the words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," so as to completely get rid of any liability for unseaworthiness. We find those words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," whether existing at the commencement of the voyage, &c., following the words which relate specially to failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, and I have no doubt that we ought to read those words, "or from any other cause whatsoever," as relating to the subject-matter there dealt with and not to read them as a general clause exempting the shipowner from the consequences of unseaworthiness. I read this clause, therefore, in this way—that the shipowner is protected from liability from loss or damage arising from failure or breakdown of the machinery, &c., or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect in the machinery, &c., which existed at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not. I adopt the argument of Mr. Hamilton that those words were intended to widen the exception, which was put in for the purpose of protecting the shipowner, and relates to breakdown of machinery, &c. That being so, I have now only to deal with the argument for the respondents that, even if that view of the clause ought to be adopted, and they are wrong in their contention that the clause was intended to cover unseaworthiness however occasioned, and whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or not, yet this was a defect of insulation. I think that that point was not really raised in the court below. I cannot think that Walton, J. would have dealt with the case in the way in which he did deal with it if that point had been really raised. I think that this was not a defect or breakdown of machinery, insulation, &c., within the meaning of this clause. The learned judge has found, as I understand, that the ship was tainted with carbolic acid, and was, therefore, unfit to carry a cargo such as frozen meat, independently altogether of the particular chamber in which the meat was being carried, and independently of any function which the insulation, as insulation, had to fulfil. That being so, I think that the facts do not bring this case within the narrower and proper construction of the large print clause; and, inasmuch as that clause cannot be construed as a general exception protecting the shipowner from liability for the consequences of unseaworthiness, I think that, in the words of Williams and Romer, L.J.J., which I have quoted, he has failed to indicate in plain language that the warranty of seaworthiness is cut down to any greater extent than by the small print clause. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that I cannot usefully add anything to the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

HANDLER v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

HANDLER v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Insurance (life)—Lapse of policy on failure of payment of premium—Subsequent payment—Conditional receipt by insurance company—Neglect of assured to read conditions of receipt—Duty of insurance company—Estoppel.

A policy of life insurance effected with an insurance company was expressed to be conditional upon the payment of the premiums each year within thirty days of their becoming due. The holder of the policy failed to pay a certain premium within thirty days of its becoming due. On his afterwards sending the money to the company they sent back to him a receipt upon a printed form, which stated that the policy had lapsed and that the payment was accepted subject to certain conditions printed on the back of the receipt. He received this receipt, but did not read it.

One of these conditions was that the person whose life was insured had been during the past twelve months in continuous good health and free from all disease; and he was in fact, and to his knowledge, suffering at that time from a disease of which he afterwards died. Until he died the subsequent premiums were punctually paid. On his death the company refused to pay the sum for which his life had been insured on the ground that the policy had lapsed, and the conditions of the receipt above mentioned had not been complied with. In an action to recover the amount of the insurance money:

Held, that, as the policy had lapsed on account of the breach of its conditions, and the plaintiff had given no evidence of any conduct on the part of the company which would justify him in thinking that the policy had not lapsed, and would estop them from relying on the lapsing of the policy, he was not entitled to succeed in the action.

APPLICATION by the defendant company for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Commissioner Bray, K.C. with a jury at Liverpool.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 1000*l.* under a policy of insurance issued by the defendant company on the life of James Clarke Williams in favour of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff carried on a tailoring business in Liverpool in partnership with J. C. Williams and another person, and the policy in question was taken out in order to secure the plaintiff against certain partnership liabilities that had arisen, or might arise, between him and J. C. Williams.

The policy was dated the 21st March 1890, and was in the following terms:

Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association.—In consideration of the application for this certificate of membership, or policy of insurance, and the declarations made to the medical examiner, which are hereby referred to and made a part of this contract, every person accepting or acquiring any interest in this contract hereby adopts as his own and admits the statements contained therein to be the only statements upon which this contract is made, and of the first year's dues paid, the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association does hereby receive James Clarke Williams, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, as a member of said association; and upon the further condition of the payment of the dues for expenses to be paid on or before the 21st March in every year during the continuance of this certificate, or policy of insurance, and also upon the further condition of the payment of all mortuary premiums payable at . . . within thirty days of the first weekdays of the months of February, April, June, August, October, and December of each and every year during the continuance of this certificate or policy of insurance . . . there shall be payable to the legal representatives of said member the sum of 1000*l.* sterling. . . Benefits under this certificate or policy of insurance shall not be impaired or restricted by travel or change of residence, and if this certificate, or policy of insurance, shall have been in continuous force for two years from its date, it shall thereafter be incontestable and indisputable, except for fraud or nonpayment of dues or mortuary premium at the times and in manner herein stipulated. . . .

On the 1st Feb. 1896, 2*l.* 5*s.*, for a mortuary call, became due on the policy, and the company, in accordance with their practice, sent the plaintiff a notice that it was due, and that it must be paid on or before the 2nd March following, and that, if it was not paid within the time stated, the policy and all payments thereon would become forfeited and void.

The plaintiff failed to pay the mortuary till the 6th March, and then when he paid it he received from the company a receipt in the following form:

Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company.—Received of C. J. Williams, Esq., this 6th day of March 1896, 2*l.* 5*s.* 0*d.*, being for payment of past due mortuary call, No. 84, 2*l.* 5*s.* 0*d.*, which became due 1st Feb. 1896 on policy No. 94,424, which said policy lapsed by reason of the non-payment of the above on or before the date the same became due. The above payment is offered and the same received by the company subject to the conditions on the back hereof, which are hereby made a part of this receipt . . . George W. Harper, Treasurer. See other side.

On the back of the receipt was printed the following:

The conditions upon which the within payment (for which this receipt is given) is accepted, are as follows: First: That said member is now living, and of temperate habits, and is now and has been during the past twelve months in continuous good health and free from all disease, infirmity or weakness, otherwise said payment and this receipt and said policy shall be and is null and void, and the sum paid hereon shall be subject to the order of the within named person. Second: The receipt and acceptance of the within sum by the company shall not be held to waive forfeiture or expiration of membership, or to reinstate membership, or create any liability on the part of the company under said policy, except upon fulfilment of the first condition of this receipt. Third: The acceptance of the within sum after the same became due shall not establish a precedent for acceptance of future payments to the company, nor shall any subsequent payment upon said policy impair, waive, alter or change any of the conditions of this receipt or of said policy. Special Notice. On the first weekday of the months of February, April, June, August, October, and December of each year mortuary calls will be made which must be paid within thirty days from the date of such call, or the policy will lapse. Members who desire can make payments annually or semi-annually in advance. . . .

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the time when this mortuary call was sent in and the above receipt given, J. C. Williams was suffering, to his own knowledge, from an incurable form of heart disease, in consequence of which he had retired from business the year before, and from which he died on the 2nd March 1903.

The plaintiff continued, up to the death of J. C. Williams, to pay the premiums on the dates as they became due.

Upon the death of J. C. Williams the company refused to pay the sum assured by the policy upon the ground that it had lapsed.

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action.

At the trial of the action at Liverpool, before Mr. Commissioner Bray, K.C. and a jury, the plaintiff gave evidence that he had not read the policy or the calls or the receipt. The questions left to the jury, and their answers, were as follows: (1) Did the plaintiff know that there was writing or printing on the receipt?—Yes. (2) Did the plaintiff know that the writing or printing upon this receipt contained terms imposing conditions upon the receipt that did not exist in the original policy?—No. (3) Did the defendants do what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of those conditions?—No.

On these findings the learned commissioner gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants applied for judgment or a new trial.

McColl, K.C. (Hugh Fraser with him) for the defendants.—The plaintiff gave evidence at the trial that he did not read the policy or the mortuary calls or the receipt. It is not denied by him that the policy had lapsed when the payment in question was made on the 6th March 1896 and the conditional receipt given, but it is contended by him that by his neglect to read the policy, the calls, and the receipt he is put in as good a position as if the receipt had been an unconditional one. The policy is expressly declared to be conditional upon the payment of all mortuary premiums "within thirty days from the first weekday of the month of February, &c., of each year." There was an admitted breach of that condition. If the plaintiff relies upon something which occurred subsequently to validate the lapsed policy, the onus is on him to prove an estoppel on the other side from relying on that which is the fact. That differentiates this case from all the cases which were relied upon at the trial of the action referring to printed tickets given to railway passengers and persons depositing goods. In all those cases the question was as to what was the original contract made between the parties. Here, under the terms of the original contract, a forfeiture undoubtedly occurred, and the plaintiff has to show something to enable him to get out of that. He has shown nothing, and the defendants are therefore entitled to judgment.

Pickford, K.C. and Lias for the plaintiff.—The defendants went on receiving premiums up to the date of the deceased's death. They are estopped from denying the continued validity of the policy. It was the duty of the company to do what was reasonable to bring to the knowledge of the plaintiff the fact that they only accepted the payment in 1896 upon certain conditions, and the jury have found that they failed to do that. The questions left to the jury were substantially the same as those which were held by the House of Lords to be the right ones to be left to the jury in the case of Richardson Spence and Co. v. Rowntree, 70 L. T. Rep. 817; (1894) A. C. 217.

There the House of Lords expressed approval of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Parker v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 36 L. T. Rep. 540; 2 C. P. Div. 416.

That was a case of a cloak-room ticket, and the court held that the plaintiff was not bound by the conditions on the ticket, if he was ignorant of them, unless the defendants had taken reasonable means to bring them to his notice. There can be no difference in this respect between making a new contract and reviving one that is dead. This conditional receipt does in fact bring a new condition into the policy, that the policy is to be void unless the assured had been in good health for a certain time previous to the receipt. The third condition is also an entirely new one. It was the duty of the defendants to call the attention of the plaintiff to the effect of the receipt. He accepted the receipt as an ordinary receipt, and as an intimation that the policy was just as it always had been.

COLLINS, M.R. (after stating the facts, continued).—Now, under these circumstances, what are the rights of the parties? The plaintiff had failed to fulfill one of the conditions of the policy, that the premiums should be paid within certain limited times. He did afterwards pay a premium that he had failed to pay within the proper time, and received a receipt from the company, but, as the policy had, ex hypothesi, come to an end, it seems to me that he can only succeed in this action on the foundation of an estoppel, that is to say, he must show that though the policy had come to an end the defendants have so acted that by their conduct they led him to suppose that the policy was still alive. It is for the plaintiff to make that out, and he can only do it by producing the receipt. That is the document upon which he must found—if he can do so at all—the implication that the defendants treated the policy as still subsisting, and induced him to act upon their conduct. It is said that the question must be decided by the finding of the jury that reasonable steps were not taken by the defendants to bring to the plaintiff's notice the conditions attached to the receipt. I am not at all myself disposed to accept that view as the true measure of the obligation of the parties in this case. It seems to me that the burden in this case is most distinctly upon the plaintiff. He begins the discussion with a policy of insurance that has lapsed, and if he is going to assert that notwithstanding the fact that it has lapsed the company are estopped from averring the truth that it has lapsed, it seems to me the burden is upon him to show that he has been misled, and it is not enough for him to say that he received from them a document which he did not read. If he showed, for instance, that the receipt which they sent him had some ambiguous phraseology in it which might reasonably be construed to mean that the policy was still alive, then I could understand his raising a question of fact for the jury, whether or not the form of the receipt was such as to mislead him into supposing that the policy was still alive. His only answer is that it had conditions on the back of it which he did not read. It seems to me that he was not misled by them. He does not prove that he was misled by them if he does not choose to read the receipt, which on the face of it says that the policy has lapsed by reason of non-payment of premiums, and refers to conditions which are set out upon the back of the receipt. Whether or not there was any question at all here for the jury I do not feel at all clear. I am not at all clear that the question whether the defendants did what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of these conditions was the true question in this case. But, assuming that it was for the purposes of this discussion, it seems to me that there was no evidence fit for the consideration of the jury, or upon which any jury could find that there was a misleading by the defendants of the plaintiff so as to create an estoppel. Even if it were a question for the jury I do not think there was any evidence in this case for them. Furthermore, I think that the particular form in which the second question was put to the jury was misleading, as it suggested that this receipt introduced some new condition which had not been originally imposed by the policy. Very possibly that may have accounted for the extraordinary view which the jury seem to have come to upon the facts. No doubt the learned commissioner who tried this case with very great care, put these questions because it was suggested to him that they were the questions which had been sanctioned by a high authority in another case; but it seems to me, although those questions may have been the proper questions in that other case, the second of the two here certainly had no special reference to the particular facts in the present case, and under the circumstances I think it was misleading. However, it is not necessary to go into that because in my judgment the whole point here is: Were the defendants estopped from affirming that the policy had come to an end? It was for the plaintiff to prove that they were, and in my opinion he has given no evidence upon which that estoppel could rest. Under these circumstances I think the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I may add that, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, the case would have been precisely the same even if the plaintiff were in a position to set up a new contract on the footing of the old policy. The only other observation that I wish to make is this: When the payment was made, or purported to be made, of the mortuary call after the thirty days had elapsed, there was nothing whatever which could possibly have induced the plaintiff to suppose, or justified him in supposing, that that premium would be unconditionally received. That being so, when he made that payment he had no reasonable ground for supposing that it would be simply received, and nothing more. When he sent this money after the time within which it ought to have been paid he received a communication with reference to that payment. He had no reason to suppose that it was a mere formal acknowledgment of the money without more. Under the circumstances it was clear that he was bound to look to see on what terms the money payment had been received, and, if he had looked, he would have found it. I conceive, therefore, that this case was not one where there were any circumstances upon which the jury could possibly find that there was such conduct on the part of the company as would justify the plaintiff in thinking that the policy had not lapsed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that at the time of the death there was a subsisting policy of insurance. Now, the original policy was gone—that is not disputed. According to these terms, it only subsisted so long as the payments were regularly made. The original policy is gone. It was open to the plaintiff to show a new contract of insurance. He might do that in one or other of two ways. First, by showing an actual agreement on the lapse of the policy; secondly, by showing that he had been misled by the conduct of the defendants in inducing him to think the policy was still a subsisting policy. The first ground, of course, cannot be sustained for a moment. The second ground, that there was an estoppel, seems to me wholly to fail. There was no evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find that the plaintiff had been misled by the defendants. The plaintiff unfortunately misled himself by reason of his failure to do what any business man might be expected to do—namely, to look at the form of the receipt sent to him. There being no ground upon which the jury could have found an estoppel, it is plain the plaintiff fails in the action. The judgment must therefore be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

STONE AND CO. v. MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Railway—Rates—Carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train—Absence of statutory duty to carry—Right of company to impose its own terms—Inclusive charge for collection, carriage, and delivery—Equality clause—Midland Railway Company Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. xviii.), s. 203—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 90—Midland Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. ccxiz.), Part 5, clause 3.

A railway company which is under no statutory obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train is entitled to demand from all persons who wish to send non-perishable goods by passenger train a single rate including collection, carriage, and delivery.

Judgment of the King's Bench Division (88 L. T. Rep. 92; (1903) 1 K. B. 741) affirmed.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversing the judgment of the judge of the Bristol County Court.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 1s., money received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, under the following circumstances:

The defendants published a list of rates for the conveyance of parcels by passenger train from Bristol. Among the articles which in this list they expressed themselves as willing to carry were "tailors' unfinished and finished clothing." For the conveyance of this by passenger train they announced only one rate which was inclusive of collection and delivery.

On the 7th Aug. 1901 the plaintiffs, who were common carriers at Bristol, collected three boxes of tailors' goods and handed them over to the defendants at the passenger station at Bristol for conveyance by passenger train to Southampton.

In accordance with the published rate the defendants demanded payment of 1l. for the conveyance of the goods.

The plaintiffs paid this sum under protest and brought this action in the Bristol County Court to recover the sum of 1s. in respect of the collection of the goods by them, that amount being one which might reasonably be held to represent the cost of collection.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Upon the defendants' appeal the King's Bench Division (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversed the decision of the County Court judge, but gave leave to appeal.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 92; (1903), 1 K. B. 741.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The Midland Railway Company's Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. cxviii.) provides as follows:

Sect. 198. And with respect to the tolls to be levied for the use of the railway, be it enacted, that the company may lawfully demand any tolls not exceeding the following (that is to say):

Sect. 200. And with respect to small packages and single articles of great weight, be it enacted, that the company may lawfully demand the tolls following; (that is to say) for the carriage of small parcels (that is to say, parcels not exceeding 500lb. weight each), the company may demand any sum which they may think fit.

Sect. 203. And be it enacted, that all tolls for the use of the railway shall be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per mile or per ton per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all goods, animals, or carriages of a like description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine; and that all tolls or charges for conveyance by the company, or for the use of carriages or locomotive power, shall be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per mile or per ton per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all passengers, and of all goods, animals, or carriages of a like description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing on the same portion of the line of railway only, and under the like circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls for the use of the railway, or such tolls or charges for conveyance by the company, or for the use of any carriages or locomotive power to be supplied by them, shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the same portion of the railway only, and under like circumstances.

The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 20) provides as follows:

Sect. 90. And whereas it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company or of particular parties; it shall be lawful, therefore, for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in the special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken, either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway, as they shall think fit, provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton per mile or otherwise, in respect of all passengers, and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway.

The Midland Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cexix.) provides as follows:

Part 5. The following provisions and regulations shall be applicable to the conveyance of perishable merchandise by passenger train . . . (3) The company shall not be under obligation to convey by passenger train, or any similar services, any merchandise other than perishables.

J. A. Foote, K.C. (Balfour Browne, K.C. and Weatherley with him) for the plaintiffs.—These tolls are really charged under sects. 198 and 200 of the defendant company's Act of 1844, and under the equality clause in sect. 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 the company is bound to charge equally all persons who send goods of this sort for conveyance by passenger train. It is not in accordance with the equality clause to have only one rate including collection and delivery. Where a railway company was empowered by statute to charge for the conveyance of small parcels "any sum which they think fit," it was held by the Exchequer Chamber, affirming the Common Pleas, that the company was still bound to charge equally, and could not lawfully demand a sum including the cost of collection and delivery, so as to impose an unequal burthen on those who did not require the performance of the latter service:

Baxendale v. Great Western Railway Company, 8 L. T. Rep. 833; 14 C. B. N. S. 1; affirmed 9 L. T. Rep. 814; 16 C. B. N. S. 137.

Here the company, under sect. 200, may demand for the carriage of small parcels "any sum which they may think fit." Even if the tolls which the company demand for the carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train are not demanded under any special statutory provision, yet when once they have fixed and published definite rates for such conveyance they are bound to charge all persons equally. Sect. 203 of their private Act of 1844 applies to "all tolls for the use of the railway," and has the same provision for equality as is to be found in sect. 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. The decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Bazendale v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) has been approved by the House of Lords:

Great Western Railway Company v. Sutton, 22 L.T. Rep. 43; L. Rep. 4 H. L. 226.

There Lord Chelmsford said that the notion that the clauses for making equal charges were inconsistent with the power given to the railway company to demand any sum they think fit for small parcels appeared to him to be unfounded. Therefore the equality clauses apply just as much to a toll fixed by a railway company under a discretionary power, as to a toll for which a maximum has been provided by Act of Parliament. Section 200 of the Midland Railway Company's Act of 1844 does not say anything as to the carriage of the goods whether by goods or by passenger train, but that may be explained by the early date of the Act, when railway companies did not divide their traffic so rigidly as now into goods and passengers. The charge made by the defendant company for carrying non-perishable goods by passenger train is a "toll" within the definition of the word in sect. 3 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. [COLLINS, M.R.—I do not think anything turns upon the technical meaning of "toll"; the point is whether the charge made by the company is payable under the Act, if they are under no obligation to carry these goods by passenger train.] Sect. 203 is not limited to tolls payable under the Act of 1844. It applies to "all tolls." I agree that there is no statutory obligation on the defendants to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train, but that is not enough to show that the equality clause does not apply to rates in fact charged by them for so doing.

Cripps, K.C. and W. G. Clay (W. J. Noble with them) for the railway company.—The charging sections of the company's special Act of 1844 do not apply now. That legislation has been superseded by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888 and the provisional orders confirmed by Act of Parliament under that Act. The company's powers of making charges are now governed by the Midland Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act 1891, except so far as some old special charges are still kept alive. Under that Act the company is under no obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train. It has therefore power to demand any rate it pleases for such a service. For this service the company is in the position of a common carrier, free from statutory obligations. As was pointed out by Blackburn, J., when he gave his opinion to the House of Lords in Great Western Railway Company v. Sutton (ubi sup.), at common law a person holding himself out as a common carrier of goods was not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. The obligation imposed on him at common law was to carry all goods delivered to him for carriage according to his profession (unless he had some reasonable excuse for not doing so) on being paid a reasonable compensation for so doing. Subject to that, a common carrier may at common law give any particular individual any privilege he likes. The case of Bazendale v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), which is relied upon by the plaintiff, has no application here. It applies only to a case where the toll charged is one authorised by the special Act. The court said that the toll in that case was none the less charged under the special Act because the company were empowered to fix the maximum. Sect. 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, in which the equality clause is to be found, has reference only to "the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken." The charging sections of the Act of 1844, even if still in force, do not apply to the carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger trains. Moreover, sect. 203, in speaking of "all tolls," is referring to the tolls authorised to be taken in the preceding sections, and therefore has no reference to a toll such as the one charged to the plaintiff, which is not authorised by any special Act. In Bazendale v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), and in Great Western Railway Company v. Sutton (ubi sup.), the company was carrying on business as a common carrier of goods from station to station. In the present case the company does not hold itself out as a carrier of non-perishable goods by passenger train from station to station, but only from house to house. There being no obligation on the company to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train, they may lawfully refuse to do so at all, but, if they choose to carry such goods, they are at liberty to ask any rate they please:

Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Company, 55 L. T. Rep. 868; 18 Q. B. Div. 176.

Foots, K.C. in reply.—Bazendale v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) was a case of carriage of goods by goods train. In other respects it was similar to the present case. Carrying goods from house to house is not a matter within the equality clause. It is not enough that the company charges the same rate to all persons for carriage from house to house. It is the conveyance of the goods over the rails that must be charged for at an equal rate to all persons.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action brought by a carrier against the Midland Railway Company, claiming to recover back money which he says has been improperly obtained from him by some species of duress—that is to say, that they demanded and received from him a sum beyond that which they were entitled to charge him. He now claims that he is entitled to recover that money back, and he relies for that purpose on the equality clause in sect. 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and in sect. 203 of the Midland Railway Company Act 1844. Now the point arises in this way: The railway company say they are not bound to carry by passenger train goods such as he tendered, which are non-perishable merchandise, and that therefore, being entirely free whether they will carry them or not, being under no obligation to carry them, and there being no toll by statute with respect to them, they do not come under the railway legislation as to equality at all. That is their point. Mr. Foots, on the other hand, contends that they do. Now, sect. 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 is in these terms: [His Lordship read the section.] Now let me first point out upon this section that that which is being there dealt with is the power conferred by law upon the company to demand certain tolls and to vary those tolls. The section says that it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls, but that such power of varying—it is all statutory—should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties. The class of toll that is being dealt with is that which is demanded under statutory powers, and the legislature emphasises that a little further down in the section by saying this: "Subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in the special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken." That is the power of alteration, and that is the power which is checked by the introduction of the equality clause in the special proviso at the end of the section. Now, it has been hardly contended by Mr. Foote that that clause is not directed to the tolls which by special legislation the company is empowered to demand, and, recognising that difficulty in that section, though he does not say it is insuperable, he prefers to rest his case upon the equality clause in the private Act of the company, and his ground for that preference is that the words of the section do not in terms appear to limit the word "toll" to the tolls specially authorised by the special Act. The section which he relies upon is sect. 203 of the Midland Railway Company's Act of 1844. It begins in these terms: "And be it enacted, that all tolls for the use of the railway shall be at all times charged equally to all persons." I will not read any more of it, for the rest of the section is practically in the same words as sect. 90 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. Mr. Foote suggests that the words "all tolls" mean all tolls which are in fact charged by the company—not merely all tolls which by law the company are entitled to demand, and that, therefore, sect. 203 is larger in its terms than sect. 90, and brings under its operation any charges which the company in fact make, whether they are the subject of legislation by special Act of Parliament or not. But when one looks to the place in which the 203rd section comes in the Act, one finds that it is simply a section in what I may call a particular code as to tolls. The Act deals with a number of different things, and then, in sect. 198, it comes to tolls: "And with respect to the tolls to be levied for the use of the railway, be it enacted that the company may lawfully demand any tolls not exceeding the following." Therefore this legislation is both empowering and limiting: it empowers the company to demand certain tolls, and it limits the amount of those tolls; and it is to those tolls, which are provided for or referred to, directly and indirectly, in sects. 198 to 203, and several others afterwards, that in my judgment the words in sect. 203 apply. The expression "all tolls" in that section means all tolls which are the subject-matter of the legislation in this code, beginning with sect. 198, a code which prescribes in detail for every possible merchandise which they, the company, are empowered to carry and authorised by law to demand a rate or charge for carrying. Therefore, in my judgment, when you look at the legislation in the private Act of 1844 it in no way differs from the legislation in the public Act of 1845. They are both statutory enactments with respect to statutory rights to demand special tolls. Then what are the statutory rights now governing the Midland Railway's undertaking? They are these. By the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), when the whole scheme of railway rates was under discussion, an enactment was made by sect. 24 to this effect: "Notwithstanding any provision in any general or special Act, every railway company shall submit to the Board of Trade a revised classification of merchandise traffic, and a revised schedule of maximum rates and charges applicable thereto, proposed to be charged by such railway company." I need not read in detail the further details of the section, which are numerous, but they provide in terms that the company shall submit a schedule, that that schedule shall be discussed before the Board of Trade, and that when sanctioned by the Board of Trade it shall be issued under the terms of a provisional order. Sub-sect. 4 provides: "If, after hearing all parties whom the Board of Trade consider to be entitled to be heard before them respecting the classification and schedule, the Board of Trade come to an agreement with the railway company as to the classification and schedule, they shall embody the agreed classification and schedule in a provisional order." That is the genesis of the provisional order. Then comes the statutory sanction. That is sub-sect. 10: "The Act of Parliament confirming any provisional order made under this section shall be a public general Act, and the rates and charges mentioned in a provisional order as confirmed by such Act shall from and after the Act coming into operation be the rates and charges which the railway company shall be entitled to charge and make." Those, and no others, are the rates which now govern the Midland Railway Company, because an Act such as is contemplated by this section—namely, the Midland Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act 1891—has been passed, which has given legislative sanction to the provisional order previously agreed to, under the terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888, by the Board of Trade. So we have to look to that Act of 1891 in order to see what are the charges they are empowered to make. Now, the Act contains a schedule of maximum rates and charges, and clause 2 of that schedule provides thus: "The maximum rate for conveyance is the maximum rate which the company may charge for the conveyance of merchandise by merchandise train; and, subject to the exceptions and provisions specified in this schedule, includes the provision of locomotive power and trucks by the company, and every other expense incidental to such conveyance not hereinafter provided for." Then follow a number of provisions as to the different services which are to be rendered, and which may be the subject-matter of rates. Then we come to the actual tariff for the different classes of merchandise. Part 5 is headed "Perishable merchandise by passenger train," and it provides: "The following provisions and regulations shall be applicable to the conveyance of perishable merchandise by passenger train: (1) The company shall afford reasonable facilities for the expeditious conveyance of the articles enumerated in the three divisions set out hereunder (which articles are hereinafter called 'perishables') either by passenger train or by other similar service. (2) Such facilities shall be subject to the reasonable regulations of the company for the convenient and punctual working of their passenger train service, and shall not include any obligation to convey perishables by any particular train." Then comes clause 3: "The company shall not be under obligation to convey by passenger train, or other similar service, any merchandise other than perishables." The merchandise in this case is merchandise other than perishables. I think that is perhaps enough of that to read. Now we come to this point: Here is a company whose rates and charges are ascertained in the way I have described by this provisional order, which is sanctioned by an Act of Parliament in 1891. That regulates its charges. By that Act the company is under no obligation whatever to carry non-perishable merchandise by a passenger train; there is no tariff fixed for it, and no statutory obligation to make a tariff. They are absolutely at large. The merchandise sent by the plaintiffs in this case was non-perishable, and was carried by passenger train, and what the company do with respect to that is this. Being under no obligation at all to carry non-perishable merchandise by passenger train, they nevertheless have given certain facilities to the public in respect of it, and they have announced that they are prepared to take this traffic from the house of the sender and deliver it at its destination at a certain rate. I daresay it would be fair to say that that rate, if analysed, would be found to contain an element representing the cost of collection and delivery as well as the cost of transit. But the company say: "With respect to this class of merchandise, as to which we are entirely at large so far as the Legislature is concerned, we are willing, of our own motion, on our own rights at common law, apart from statute, being the owners of machinery whereby the conveyance of merchandise can be carried on, to give the public this facility if they like to take it. If they do not like to take it, they can leave it alone; and the only facility we will give for carrying merchandise by passenger train is this: We will charge an inclusive rate for the whole service, which you may avail yourself of or not, just as you like; but you must pay this inclusive charge, which is the only charge we make for this, whether you get the benefit of all the incidental services or not. If you like to collect your own goods and deliver them at our station, and ask us to send them from there, we tell you we will make the same charge as if we ourselves had collected and delivered; that is the only rate we quote for it. We are under no obligation to quote any rates; and if you like to take that facility you may take it or else leave it alone." Then say the plaintiffs: "That will not do; we collect our own goods, we tender them at your station, and therefore we ought not to be charged the same as other persons who cannot collect their own goods, and for whom you collect and take the goods to the station. We insist on your charging us only a rate which does not embrace collection and delivery in other words, we insist on your charging us a station to station rate." If the plaintiffs had a right to demand a station to station rate, that would undoubtedly be a very strong argument. But when they have no right to demand a station to station rate—when they are not entitled by law to insist upon reasonable facilities being given for the transit of their goods in that particular way from one station to another—is not it obvious that they cannot complain when the railway company refuse to give them a station to station rate, and say: "The only terms upon which we will carry non-perishable goods by passenger train is upon a rate which includes collection and delivery"? I think it is perfectly true to say, as the Lord Chief Justice said in the court below, in effect you are demanding a station to station rate; you are demanding a facility which by law you are not entitled to ask; you are at the mercy of the railway company in this matter, and you can only get the facility of sending this merchandise by passenger train upon the terms of what they are exacting for it, no matter where it comes from—that is to say, on the terms of a rate embracing collection and delivery. Mr. Foote says that, even though there is no obligation to take it from the station, nevertheless, if the company, in point of fact, do carry these goods and make a charge which embraces collection and delivery against a person for whom they have not collected, they have in fact charged a sum which is unequal with regard to him; they have given him fewer facilities and advantages, and they have exacted a charge for the whole as though facilities had been given. He says that that raises an inequality, and he cites the case of Bazendale v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) to show that, even under these circumstances, the equality clause applies. But in the case cited the company were bound to take the particular class of goods in question and to carry them in the way they did carry them, and they were also entitled by law to demand a tariff in respect of doing it. It is true that the precise amount of that charge was left to their discretion; but they had no discretion whatever to refuse to carry the goods, and they had by law the right to demand a toll for them, and therefore the court said: "It is true you are at large as to the amount of the toll, but you are not at large as to anything else; whatever you demand for them you demand as a statutory right under the exigency of the statute, and therefore you come under the equality clause, and you must deal equally with all people." But the difference here—and it is the cardinal difference—is this, that this particular traffic is governed by no statute at all. There is no obligation to carry; there is no statute imposed for carrying it. That being so, the company are outside the railway legislation. That railway legislation, in my opinion, is limited to that which the company is by law placed in a position to demand. The company is a creature of the statute, and, in so far as the Legislature gives it special powers, it imposes special obligations. But where the Legislature leaves the company at large and gives no powers at all, then there is no necessity for imposing limitations, and it has not imposed them. In fact, I think the whole of this case may be summed up in the short and exceedingly conclusive judgment of Wills J. in the court below. The company have the right to carry the goods; they are not debarred from carrying the goods. They are not empowered to carry the goods, but they are not debarred from carrying the goods. Is there any statutory provision for them to carry these goods by passenger train? There is none. Then they are outside the Act of Parliament. In my opinion this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—So far as concerns the carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train, the company, since the Act of 1891, is clearly under no obligation to carry at all, and, if it does carry at all, it appears to me that the company may prescribe as between what termini it will carry, and the amount of the rate. I think, therefore, the company is entitled to say that it will only carry non-perishable goods by passenger train, not from station to station, but only from house to house; and it is then further entitled to charge a through rate for that carriage, including collection and delivery. Even if it be admitted that there must be equality of charge, the only equality need be that the through rate is not charged differently as between different persons availing themselves of the company's offer of carriage from house to house at a through rate. I need not, perhaps, mention that it cannot be reasonably contended that there is inequality merely because one house may be more distant than another. Then, if a man voluntarily chooses to spare the company the necessity of collection, can he do more than offer to the company to treat his case as one where the goods are being sent from house to house at the through rate? I think not. The company is entitled to say that it will only send the goods on that footing. The case, in fact, is like one where the house from which the goods are sent happens to be very close to the railway station. The man sending the goods under these circumstances cannot afterwards say that there has been a carriage of his goods merely from station to station, and not from house to house, and claim a return of part of the through rate on that footing, and therefore I think the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be clearly made out that this arrangement of the company with respect to the carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train was an option given to the public, imposing the terms upon which the goods would be carried. They were entitled to do that; they were entitled to do that as common carriers. That being the foundation of any contract with respect to non-perishable goods to be carried by passenger train by the defendants, the plaintiffs say: "That does not suit us, because we do not want the goods collected. Therefore we insist upon your making a new contract with us to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train from station to station." Is it not an answer for the company to say: "We made no such contract, nor undertook to make any such contract; you must accept the terms that we impose or else send your goods by goods train; you have that alternative. If they are to go by passenger train, it can only be upon the terms that we are entitled to offer." I therefore agree with my learned brothers in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I should like to add an observation. No question of undue preference arises in this case, and therefore there is no necessity whatever of any expression of opinion as to whether any claim upon that ground could be supported.

BRINCKMAN AND OTHERS v. MATLEY. (a)

Foreshore—Right of access—Limits of public user—Bathing in the sea from foreshore owner by private persons.

Where the foreshore lying between high-water mark and low-water mark of ordinary tides is owned by private persons, in the absence of proof of a customary right to go upon such foreshore, there is no common law right to go there, except for certain purposes, such as in order to avoid peril arising in the course of navigation on the sea, and probably launching a boat for the purposes of fishing. There is no common law right to bathe.

It is not to be inferred that the owner of the foreshore has dedicated it to the public from the mere fact that he does not object to people who do no damage wandering at will over the sand from time to time uncovered by the sea.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the manor of Minster, in the Isle of Thanet, and claimed to be the owners of the foreshore at a bay called Joss Bay.

The defendant was the headmaster of St. Saviour's Elementary School, Poplar.

In July 1903 the defendant brought some 200 boys from his school to a camp pitched on the cliffs immediately adjoining Joss Bay.

The camp was situated on land held by Mr. Harmsworth as customary freehold of the manor of Minster, who allowed the defendant and the boys to come down for a summer holiday and occupy his land for the time being.

The plaintiffs asked for (1) a declaration as to their rights to the foreshore; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants, agents, and workmen, from bathing from the foreshore or any part thereof, and from wrongfully entering upon the foreshore or any part thereof for that purposes.

The question was whether the public were entitled to bathe in the sea from the above-named foreshore.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Astbury, K.C. and Leonard Mossop for the plaintiffs. — This is an action substantially between the plaintiffs and Mr. Harmsworth to try whether Joss Bay is in fact situate in part of the manor, and whether the plaintiffs have ordinary manorial rights over it. Mr. Harmsworth has no lease of any land lying on the other side of the cliffs. From there to the point where the foreshore commences the defendants and Mr. Harmsworth have no rights. As to common law rights in the foreshore, there is for certain purposes a common law right of way along it parallel with the sea, but there is no right to go down to the sea from inland. The original grant shows that this manor includes foreshore. Mr. Harmsworth, through whom the defendant claims, is the owner of customary freeholds of this manor, and plaintiffs need only prove reputation and acts of ownership assented to by all persons interested in disputing them over the portion in question. For instance, prior to the period when coastguards were introduced, the lord of the manor was allowed to collect and sell wreckage that drifted ashore. Subsequent to that period the Government have insisted that the Admiralty servants shall collect it, but they have directed that the collection shall be handed over by the owner of the coastguard to the owner of the foreshore, and shall account to him for the same. This was done to prevent squabbling as to who should collect it. There are also many records of courts of law recognising our title, and there are copies of accounts rendered by the Board of Trade to Lord Conyngham since the Admiralty collected wreckage. The Broadstairs Council admitted our title in 1897. Defendant's plea that he is seised in fee simple of Joss Farm, and that he and his predecessors in title and their tenants and all authorised persons by him had for forty years previous to this action enjoyed as of right and without interruption a right of way on foot from the farm to the foreshore to bathe in the sea is difficult to understand. The right must arise by prescription, as it certainly cannot by custom. For the purpose of a right of way you must have definite termini. A man who prescribes to bathe himself cannot afterwards say that because he bathed for a certain number of years, therefore he can go with 200 boys and do the same thing. Prescription must be certain. There is no customary right in the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter to bathe in the sea. A custom must be defined, and the parish is a very large one. And even if there were a custom of this kind, it would not authorise 200 boys from Poplar to bathe. They are not inhabitants of the parish for the purpose of exercising a custom, inasmuch as they are not permanently resident there.

Buckmaster, K.C. and R. W. Sheldon for the defendant.—It may be well to differentiate the right of the 200 boys to bathe from the right of the defendant to bathe. The injunction asked for would restrain the defendant from bathing. [BUCKLEY, J.—The point to be determined is whether defendant and 200 boys are entitled to bathe.] The defendant claims for himself and the boys, but not jointly. He claims the right for himself and the right for the boys. All the subjects of the Crown have a common law right to use the foreshore for the purpose of bathing. Now, Blundell v. Catterall (5 Barn. & Alderson, 268) is the only case in which the point has been expressly decided. The facts in it are not identical with the facts in this case, unless in this case the lord of the manor is found to have exclusive rights of fishing, and there is also the minor point of distinction that there is strong evidence of a right of access to the foreshore at Joss Gap. The decision in Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) was confined to the question whether there was a right of going across the seashore for the purpose of bathing. It did not deal with the general question of a public highway along the shore. It did not decide anything that would affect any right that might be claimed by usage or custom. If the right to have access to the shore is established in this way, then there would follow from it the right to use this shore for the purpose of bathing. The defendant has either at common law or by statute a prescriptive right from the farm to enter upon the foreshore, and in connection therewith to use it for the purpose of bathing. If there is such a right of entering the foreshore in the owners of the Joss Farm and in persons by them authorised, the cases show a right to bathe, for, having entered, they may do all lawful acts there, and bathing is a lawful act. There is no private property in the sea. Prescription is based on acts of trespass. As soon as a man has prescribed it ceases to be an act of trespass. [BUCKLEY, J.—You cannot prescribe for a right to wander at will over a man's land except for a purpose.] A man can prescribe for a right of access to the foreshore. Once on the foreshore he is not trespassing, as it is admitted that the foreshore is a highway. One wants no common law right to bathe; one wants a right to have access to the sea for the purpose of bathing. There is also sufficient evidence of dedication in this case. Lastly, there is a custom for the inhabitants of the parish to come down and enter on the foreshore at this point and bathe therefrom. For the purposes of such a custom an inhabitant may be a temporary inhabitant. [At the conclusion of the evidence counsel abandoned the defence by prescription.]

Asbury, K.C. in reply.—In Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) it is laid down that even on a part of the sea coast whether there is admittedly a highway parallel with the sea, and where people can admittedly be on the foreshore in the line of that highway, there is no common right of bathing, and that bathing can be stopped from that highway. As to the lord not being proved to have the exclusive right of fishing, there is no evidence that he has not the right of fishing as a right appendant to the foreshore. With regard to the right of access at Joss Gap, the excuse by the farmer of Joss Farm of a practice of getting seaweed or going down to the shore with his carts proves nothing at all against the lord. As it is impossible to prescribe against the lord, the right, if there be one, must have been acquired by dedication. There is no indication at Joss Gap that a footway was intended. The cutting was made for carts on the footing that the owner of the foreshore had no control over the road at Joss Gap, a double dedication would have to be shown: (1) dedication by the owner of the farm to some point on the foreshore; (2) a dedication by the owner of the foreshore from that point in a straight line to the sea for the purpose of bathing. The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:

- Schwinze v. Dowell*, 2 F. & F. 845;
- Chamber Colliery v. Hopwood*, 73 L. T. Rep. 258; 32 Ch. Div. 549;
- Blount v. Layard*, (1891) 2 Ch. 631 n.;

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—BUCKLEY, J.—The question in this action is whether the public are entitled to bathe in the sea off the foreshore, near Broadstairs, in Kent. The plaintiff, the Marquis of Conyngham, and the plaintiffs, Sir Theodore Brinckman, and the Hon. Arthur William de Moleyns, as trustees for him, are the owners of the manor of Minster, in the Isle of Thanet, and of the foreshore lying between the ordinary high-water mark and the ordinary low-water mark of the sea at a bay called Joss Bay, being the place at which rights are claimed by the defendant in this action. They were, until recently, the owners of a much larger extent of foreshore, but they have sold that which lies between Hackemdown Point near the North Foreland and Margate on the one side, and that which lies between Margate and Broadstairs on the other, remaining owners of all that which lies between Hackemdown Point and Broadstairs. In this last-mentioned length of foreshore lies the small bay or curvature of the coast called Joss Bay, the scene of the dispute in this action. The title of the plaintiffs, whom I have named, to the foreshore is, in my opinion, quite plain, and is derived under a grant by the King in the ninth year of James I, whereby he granted the manor of Minster, and all lands theretofore overflown with the water of the sea which had been gaining from the sea and reduced to dry ground, and lands then overflown with the water of the sea which should hereinafter be gained and be reduced to dry ground, abutting on the manor, and lands subject to the inundation of the sea between the flowing and ebbing of the sea. In the court rolls of the manor are to be found, for at least 150 years last past, entries of payments made upon the footing that the ownership of the foreshore was in the plaintiffs' predecessors in title. Thus there are entries from 1755 onwards in respect of fines for the groundage of vessels on the foreshore, and of sums paid for permission to gather seaweed and sand in the manor between high and low water mark, and of payments made for trespass to gather flints, and of payments made for trespass in working part of the cargo of a vessel, and going with carts for that purpose, and for trespass to get seaweed. There are also accounts of payments made to the lord of the manor for wreckage taken up on the foreshore. In later times, after the Board of Trade became entitled to collect wreckage, there are accounts rendered by the Board of Trade and payments made by them to the lord for proceeds of sale of wreck taken upon the foreshore. In 1889 there are two cases in which Stirling, J. granted injunctions at the suit of the plaintiff to restrain persons from digging and getting sand, shingle, stone, or beach from the foreshore. In brief, this foreshore is plainly proved to be the property of the plaintiffs, and as private owners. The other plaintiff, Frederick William Turner, is a man who, under a deed dated the 9th Feb. 1903, executed by the steward of the manor, obtained liberty to enter on a portion of the foreshore, including Joss Bay, for the purpose of placing bathing-machines, tents, and pay-boxes on the shore. In July 1903 he was exercising his rights under that deed. The defendant is the headmaster of St. Saviour's Elementary School, Poplar, in the county of Middlesex. In July last he brought some 200 boys belonging to his school down to a camp situate on the cliffs immediately adjoining Joss Bay. The land upon which he placed his camp belongs to a Mr.

Harmsworth. It is customary freehold held by Harmsworth of the manor at a quit-rent. Harmsworth has been admitted tenant on the court rolls with services, and pays the quit-rent. The defendant pitched his camp with the permission of Mr. Harmsworth, who, for the best motives, no doubt, allowed the master and the boys to come down for a summer holiday, and occupy his land for the time being. In July 1903 the attention of the steward of the manor was called to the fact that these boys were bathing in Joss Bay. On the 25th July the steward wrote a letter to the defendant to the effect that, as a matter of right, they were not entitled to do so, adding that, in the event of the defendant's considering the bathing beneficial to the boys under his charge, he would be prepared to make arrangements with him. The defendant, by his reply, did not accept the offer; said that the boys did no harm, and added that if the steward wished to raise the question of the right of the boys to bathe in Joss Bay, he must refer him to Mr. Harmsworth's solicitors, Messrs. Lewis and Lewis. The defendant thus setting up a claim of right the writ in this action was issued on the 28th July 1903. The question I have to try is simply whether the defendant and his boys are as of right entitled to go on the foreshore at Joss Bay, which is the private property of the plaintiffs, and bathe in the sea. The defendant contends that that which he is doing is justified by a common law right, which he says exists, to do the acts complained of. The proposition is put in two ways: First, that there is a common-law right to go upon the foreshore, to pass and repass there at will, and, further, being there, to bathe in the sea; and, secondly, supposing there is not this common law right to go upon the foreshore and pass and repass thereon at will, that if the defendant shows, as he says he does, that he has in some way a right of access, then, being there in exercise of such right of access, he and his boys are entitled to bathe. I deal with these two in order. As to the first, no facts are wanted beyond that which I have stated—that this foreshore is the private property of the plaintiffs. The defendant contends that he has a common law right to go upon this land, being private property of the plaintiffs, and to bathe therefrom, because it is the foreshore. I propose to state what I understand to be the law as to the right of a member of the public to go on the foreshore of a private owner. By the common law all the King's subjects have in general a right of passage over the sea with vessels for the purposes of navigation and have, prima facie, a common of fishery there, and they have the same rights over that portion of the sea which lies over the foreshore at the times when the foreshore is covered with water. But when the sea recedes and the foreshore becomes dry there is not, as I understand the law, any general common law right in the public to pass over the foreshore. There are certain limited rights, and the fact that such limited rights exist goes to show that there cannot be a general right. For purposes of navigation there exists a common law right to cross the foreshore in case of peril or necessity. For the purpose of exercising the right of fishing it may be that there is—I do not say that there is—a right to cross the foreshore in order to launch a boat. In Broke's Abridgment,

BRINCKMAN AND OTHERS v. MATLEY.

Tit. Customs, pl. 46, all the judges agreed "that fishermen may justify going on the land adjoining the sea to fish in the sea, for this is for the good of the Commonwealth, affording sustenance to many persons, and is the common law." The right of navigation, it has been said, is for the general benefit of all the kingdom, and the right of fishing tends to the sustenance and beneficial enjoyment of individuals, and for these purposes it would seem that there are special rights to cross the foreshore. But it does not follow, and I think is not the law, that the public have the right to go upon or to cross the foreshore for all purposes. If there be such a general right by common law it must exist on every part of the foreshore; and the result would be that the erection of buildings, wharves, and quays, so as to reach the water, the reclamation of additional land from the sea and its conversion to pasturage and tillage, the erection of stakes for nets upon the foreshore, and the digging of sand or stones which might leave dangerous openings in the foreshore, would all be indictable as being interferences with a right of highway over the foreshore. I have endeavoured thus to summarise the reasoning upon which, as it seems to me, in Blundell v. Catterall (5 Barn. & Ald. 268), it was, after citation of numerous passages from Lord Hale, de jure maris, decided that there is no common law right of going upon the foreshore with a view to bathing therefrom and exercising any supposed common law right of bathing. Holroyd, J. at p. 301 of the report, puts the greater part of the matter in a small compass, thus: "The public common law rights, too, with respect to the sea, independently of usage, are rights upon the water, not upon the land, of passage and fishing on the sea and on the seashore when covered with water, and though, as incident thereto, the public must have the means of getting to and upon the water for those purposes, yet it will appear that it is by and from such places only as necessity or usage have appropriated to those purposes, and not a general right of lading, unlading, landing, or embarking where they please upon the seashore, or the land adjoining thereto, except in case of peril or necessity." In Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) there was found to be a public right of way along the shore, but, looking at Holroyd, J.'s judgment at p. 289 of the report, the existence of such highway in no way affected the decision. The point was that the acts committed were committed for other purposes than as a general public highway, and out of the highway, by the latter of which I understand that the public left so much of the foreshore as was a highway, and crossed over the part which was not a highway down to the sea, and there bathed. Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) has been followed in Mace v. Philcox (9 L. T. Rep. 766; 15 C. B. N. S. 600) and Llandudno Urban District Council v. Woods (1899) 2 Ch. 705. It is binding upon me. The defendant before me sought to distinguish Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) from the present case by pointing out that the owner of the foreshore there had an exclusive right of fishing; but I cannot see that that fact formed any essential basis of the judgment. The judgment seems to me to have rested upon the general principles which I have endeavoured to state. I pass to the second point, and here I must state some facts. First, Joss Bay is approached from the land down a cutting (made through the cliffs, which are here about 20ft. high) which is called Joss Gap. In Joss Gap, between the sides of the cutting and at a short distance above the upper limit of the foreshore, which is here practically at the foot of the cliff, there had stood for many years—as long as the recollection of any of the witnesses—either a bar between two posts or a single post in the middle of the roadway, which could be let down at will so as to allow a cart to pass. This post, and the bar which succeeded it, was locked, and the holder of the key and no one else could go down Joss Gap with carts. The key of that bar was held, and the bar was repaired, by the successive owners of Joss Farm, Mr. Harmsworth and his predecessors in title. Only he and the persons to whom he might allow the use of the key could get down Joss Gap with carts. There was, however, no physical obstacle to prevent any one on foot passing down, either by stooping under the bar or by passing between the post and the cliffs, if, as was sometimes the case, there was sufficient room there. The result was, that it was physically possible for persons on foot, without substantial obstruction, to pass down Joss Gap, and thus reach the foreshore. This had been the case for a great many years. The defendant says that I ought to infer from it that the lord of the manor has dedicated to the public, who could thus reach the foot of Joss Gap, the right to go upon and pass over the foreshore. Secondly, for many years, down to about fifteen years ago, there were some fishing boats at Joss Bay—some four or five of them. A few fishermen, who lived in Reading-street, an adjoining hamlet, owned these boats, and used to go down and launch and draw up their boats there. Thirdly, the defendant says—I will presently state the facts as I find them—that the tenant of Joss Farm, by unlocking the bar, and other farmers in the district, by going round from Broadstairs and otherwise approaching the foreshore, have gone with carts and collected seaweed. From these circumstances he seeks to evolve a right in the public to have access to the foreshore, and then argues that, having access to it, they have a common law right to bathe. As to the collection of seaweed, I find the facts to be as follows: The lord of the manor from time to time granted lease of the right to get seaweed, and many, at any rate, of the carts to which the defendant's evidence spoke, were carts of the lessees or of persons who went for them or by their authority. If there were any carts not included in that category (which was not plain upon the evidence), they did not in any case go adversely to the lord and under claim of right so to do. The accumulation of the seaweed on the foreshore was at times a nuisance, and it was an advantage to get rid of it. At most, I think, the evidence comes to this—that sometimes unauthorised persons went, perhaps to collect seaweed, and nobody interfered with them. From no one of the three sets of circumstances above mentioned can I find any right of the public to a way over the foreshore. As regards Joss Gap, there is no suggestion of a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem. What is suggested is a dedication of a right to wander at will anywhere over the foreshore, and a right to wander at will in any direction down to the brink of the sea. Such a dedication cannot I think, be maintained:

(Chapman v. Cripps, 2 F. & F. 864). As a separate and independent consideration altogether, it is, I think, impossible to infer a dedication from the mere fact that the owner of the foreshore has not objected to the public wandering at will over the sand from time to time uncovered by the sea, they doing no harm in so doing. I refer, without reading them at length, to two passages upon this—the one in the judgment of Abbott, C.J. in Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.), at p. 315 of the report, as to wandering at will in all directions over wastes and commons, as to which he says: "No one ever thought that any right existed in favour of this enjoyment"; and the other in Bowen, L.J. judgment in Blount v. Layard (1891, 2 Ch. 691) (the Mapledurham fishing case), where he uses these words: "Nothing worse can happen in a free country than to force people to be churlish about their rights for fear that their indulgence may be abused, and drive them to prevent the enjoyment of things which, although they are matters of private property, naturally give pleasure to many others besides the owners, under the fear that their good nature may be misunderstood. I can conceive nothing more unfortunate than that the owners of the right of fishing on large streams should be driven to prevent the successors and followers of Izaak Walton from dropping their lines for trout for fear that their doing so should crystallise into a right. It would be a most unfortunate thing for the public if that should ever happen, and I think that, however continuous, however lengthy the indulgence may have been, a jury ought to be warned against extracting out of it an inference unfavourable to the person who has granted the indulgence." I refer also to Chamber Colliery Company v. Hopwood (73 L. T. Rep. 258; 32 Ch. Div. 549). I think, therefore, that there was no such right of access at Joss Gap as the defendant sets up, and I only add that, if there were, this would not bring the case to Blundell v. Catterall (ubi sup.) again, where there was a public right of way along some part of the foreshore. The facts as to the boats are still weaker, and what I have said as to a possible right of access for the purpose of fishing is to be borne in mind. If such a right exists (I do not say it does) it will not help the defendant. The alleged right or claim of access to get seaweed seems to me even further from having any bearing upon the question for decision. The defendant sought at the outset to defend the case upon other two grounds upon which I will say a word. The first was that he endeavoured to set up against the lord a prescriptive right in Harmsworth of passing from Joss Gap over the foreshore, and a user by the defendant and his boys of that prescriptive right by the leave and licence of Harmsworth. This was ultimately abandoned at the Bar, for, as soon as it was shown that Harmsworth was a tenant of the manor and had been admitted tenant under service, it was, of course, impossible to contend that he could prescribe against the lord. Moreover, even if that had not been so, the considerations which I have suggested above as sufficient to defeat any claim of dedication to the public would, I think, defeat also any claim to prescription for an indefinite right to wander at will. The second was that it was attempted to set up a customary right in the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter's to bathe at Joss Gap.

Upon this I find the facts to be as follows: That in this immediate neighbourhood there are several bays which are convenient for, and have for many years been used for bathing. Coming from the south they are Dumpton Bay, Louisa Bay, Broadstairs, Stone Bay, Joss Bay, Botany Bay, and there may be others. Resort has been made to these several bays for many years past, not by the inhabitants of St. Peter's or any other particular parish, but anyone who was minded to bathe. As a matter of date this has gone on from at least 1842. There are many boys' schools in St. Peter's, some of them existing at that date, and some of subsequent date. Boys from these schools, to the number of thirty or forty or more at a time, have gone down to bathe sometimes at one sometimes at another of these bathing places. Nobody has ever interfered with them till quite recently. The bathers have included people from Margate, which is not in St. Peter's parish; from Ramsgate, which is not in that parish; trippers from London and other distant places, and others. Nobody has ever heard of any claim set up by the inhabitants of St. Peter's, as distinguished from the general public, to bathe at all, or to bathe at any particular place. The custom alleged is unknown to anyone who has given evidence before me. There are plenty of witnesses who say that the bathing has taken place, but nobody has alleged any claims of right to do it. All they say is that they thought every member of the public had a right to bathe wherever he liked. Joss Bay was the better bay in the sense that the shore was more free from flints and rocks, and it was perhaps used more than the others. I will give one or two references to the evidence adduced by the defendant. Mr. Snowden, who established a school at St. Peter's some years ago—about 1890—chose St. Peter's for the erection of his school because on inquiry he found that the coast offered a safe bathing place. He made inquiries on the subject, and came to the neighbourhood because there was a good shore. He built in St. Peter's parish, but not because anyone told him that the inhabitants of that parish had any rights which others did not enjoy. As the result of his inquiries, he thought all the shore was equally open to him, and, if he had found Stone Bay preferable to Joss Bay, he would have gone there. He thought the whole sea was open to him, and that he could use any particular place at his own discretion. Nobody told him he had a right to bathe at Joss Gap or elsewhere, or that he could bathe at Joss Gap if he was an inhabitant of St. Peter's parish, and not otherwise. Mr. Byron, who has been chairman of the district council, and who has lived at St. Peter's forty-four years, and whose half-brother kept a school there, has never heard of any custom; he has never heard of any question raised as to whether people had a right to bathe or not, and thought that people generally were free to bathe at Joss Gap or Broadstairs or elsewhere as they liked. Mr. Skinner, who is clerk to the urban district council, and who went with a deputation to the steward of the manor when the corporation of Broadstairs was minded to buy this particular foreshore, says that the steward told that deputation that there were no rights against the lord as far as the steward knew, and that he (Skinner) did not say, because he did not think, that there was any right of bathing; he never heard of any right or custom in the inhabitants of St. Peter's; he never supposed there was any right, but thought that the public had a right to bathe when they pleased, and that was all. In other words, he thought there was a common-law right to bathe. The result is that I find that there is no such custom as alleged. There is no evidence of a customary right in the inhabitants of St. Peter's or of any other defined place, no identification of any spot to which the custom relates, and no evidence that anybody ever heard of any custom of any kind. The result of all this is that the defendant fails in establishing the right which he sets up. I have no reason to suppose that this judgment will produce any practical difficulty, or that these East-end boys, if they are taken again to this coast, will be prevented during their summer holidays from enjoying the healthful recreation of bathing in the sea. Mr. Saltwell, by his letter of the 25th July, offered to make an arrangement for that purpose. The tone of his letter is not that the lord has any desire churlishly to exclude anyone from a reasonable use of the foreshore; but, on the contrary, that his desire is to ensure, by proper regulations as to bathing, that other members of the public shall not, by reason of bathing on this large scale, be unable to resort to it. His object seems to be to control an extravagant user by some which tends to prevent a reasonable enjoyment by all. He desires to have control over his own property. All this, however, rests in the good sense and good feeling of the owner. What I have to decide is the question of right. The claim of right having been made and having failed, I must give judgment against the defendant. I declare that the plaintiffs, other than Turner, are entitled to the foreshore lying between ordinary high-water mark and ordinary low-water mark in Joss Bay, and I grant an injunction in the terms of par. 2 of the claim. The defendant must pay the costs of the action.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ASHTON GAS COMPANY. (a)

Gas company—Standard rate of dividend fixed by statute—Payment of dividend free of income tax—Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), ss. 40, 54, 60, No. III. (3), and 102—Income Tax Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 40—Ashton Gas Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 201)—Ashton Gas Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 176), ss. 16, 17.

Sect. 16 of the Ashton Gas Act 1877 provides that the profits of the Ashton Gas Company to be divided among the shareholders in any one year shall not exceed the rate of 10 per cent. per annum (defined in the Act as the standard rate of dividend) on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorised by Parliament and paid up.

Sect. 17 of the same Act provided that a standard price is to be charged by the company for gas, and that the company may increase or diminish the standard dividend in a certain ratio, to be determined by reference to the price charged by them for gas.

The company for many years paid dividends exceeding the standard rate of dividend to their shareholders, diminishing the standard price of gas and increasing proportionally the standard rate of dividend. The company distributed all such dividends to their shareholders free of income tax.

Held, that by paying the maximum rate of dividend free of income tax the company were in effect paying a higher rate of interest than was authorised by sects. 16 and 17 of the Ashton Gas Act.

ACTION.

The Ashton-under-Lyne Gas Company is regulated by the provisions of the Ashton Gas Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 201), as amended by the Ashton Gas Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 176).

By sect. 16 of the latter Act it is provided that

The profits of the company to be divided among the shareholders in any year shall not exceed the rate of 10 per cent. per annum (which rate is in this Act referred to as "the standard rate of dividend") on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorised by Parliament and paid up.

This section is subject to sect. 17 of the same Act, which enacts that

The standard price to be charged by the company for gas supplied by them shall be three shillings and eightpence per thousand cubic feet: Provided that the company may increase or diminish such standard price subject to the decrease or increase in the standard rate of dividend as defined by this Act to be calculated as follows: For every penny charged in excess or diminution of such standard price in any year, the standard rate of dividend shall for such year be reduced or increased by five shillings in the hundred pounds per annum.

The Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35) enacts:

Sect. 40. That all bodies politic, corporate, or collegiate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies of persons, whether corporate or not corporate, shall be chargeable with such and the like duties as any person will under and by virtue of this Act be chargeable with; and that the chamberlain or other officer acting as treasurer, auditor, or receiver for the time being of every such corporation, company, fraternity, fellowship, or society shall be answerable for doing all such acts, matters, and things as shall be required to be done by virtue of this Act, in order to the assessing such bodies corporate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies to the duties granted by this Act, and paying the same.

Sect. 54. That every such officer before described of any corporation, fraternity, fellowship, company, or society shall also within the like period prepare and deliver in like form and manner a true and correct statement of the profits and gains to be charged on such corporation, fraternity, fellowship, company, or society, computed according to the directions of this Act, together with such declaration of the manner of estimating the same as aforesaid; and such estimate shall be made on the amount of the annual profits and gains of such corporation, fraternity, fellowship, company, or society before any dividend shall have been made thereof to any other persons, corporations, or companies having any share, right, or title in or to such profits or gains; and all such other persons and corporations or companies shall allow out of such dividends a proportionate reduction in respect of the duty so charged: Provided always, that nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed to require in such a statement the inclusion of salaries, wages, or profits of any officer of such corporation, fraternity, fellowship, company, or society, otherwise chargeable under this Act.

In respect of gasworks, which are assessed under sched. A, sect. 60 of the Act provides:

No. III. (3). The duty in each of the last three rules to be charged on the person, corporation, company, or society of persons, whether corporate or not corporate, carrying on the concern, or on their respective agents, treasurers, or other officers having the direction or management thereof, or being in receipt of the profits thereof, on the amount of the produce or value thereof, and before paying, rendering, or distributing the produce or the value, either between the different persons or members of the corporation, company, or society engaged in the concern, or to the owner of the soil or property or to any creditor or other person whatever having a claim on or out of the said profits; and all such persons, corporations, companies, and societies respectively shall allow out of such produce or value a proportionate deduction of the duty so charged, and the said charge shall be made on the said profits exclusively of any lands used or occupied in or about the concern.

The company have for many years paid dividends exceeding the standard rate of dividend to their shareholders, diminishing the standard price of gas and increasing proportionally the standard rate of dividend as authorised by sect. 17 of the Act.

This was done in accordance with resolutions passed at the annual meetings of the company, and they distributed all such dividends to their shareholders free of income tax.

This action was brought by the Attorney-General and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Aston-under-Lyne. The corporation (who were the relators) were large consumers of gas, and as such were interested in getting the price of gas reduced.

The question was whether the gas company had, by paying the income tax payable in respect of its dividends, in effect paid a higher dividend than was lawful having regard to the price from time to time charged for the gas.

The plaintiffs asked for the following declaration: "That according to the true construction of the Ashton Gas Acts 1847 and 1877, and in particular of sects. 16 and 17 of the Act of 1877, the profits divisible in any year among the shareholders of the company ought to be calculated as inclusive and not exclusive of the amount payable for that year in respect of income tax on the profits proposed to be divided."

Danckwerts, K.C. and R. J. Parker, for the informant and plaintiffs, contended that the proper course would be for the company to deduct the tax from the profits which they distribute to the shareholders. This company pays more than it is allowed; in effect it is paying more than the statutory dividend. The following cases were referred to:

Mason v. Ashton Gas Company, 54 L. T. Rep. 708;
Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 52 L. T. Rep. 604; 10 App. Cas. 438; Gilbertson v. Ferguson, 46 L. T. Rep. 10; 7 Q. B. Div. 562.

Henry Terrell, K.C. and W. M. Cann for the defendants.—A company is bound to pay income tax on its profits; it does not matter how the profits are applied, and they have power to deduct from creditors (Mersey Docks v. Lucas, 49 L. T. Rep. 781; 8 App. Cas. 891) or shareholders, but are not compelled to do so. The first thing that is payable out of profits is income tax, and the company has nothing to distribute till that has been paid. Sect. 16 of the Ashton Gas Act provides that certain profits are to be divided among the shareholders. Sect. 18 defines profits as part of the gains of the company or otherwise clear profits. There is a difference between profits and clear profits; clear profits cannot exist until the income tax is paid. They referred to London County Council v. Attorney-General, (1901) App. Cas. 26.

Danckwerts, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—BUCKLEY, J.—By sects. 16 and 17 of their special Act of 1877 the defendant company are precluded from paying dividend in excess of a certain rate fixed by a sliding scale dependent upon the price charged for gas. Their practice has been and is to pay dividend at the maximum rate thus fixed, but free of income tax. The whole question in the case is whether this was a payment in excess of that allowed by the Act. The point is the simplest possible, and, but for the fact that some provisions of the Income Tax Acts have to be considered, and that these Acts are not always easy of construction, I should have thought it incapable of the amount of argument which it has received. The obvious solution seems to be that when the company pays, say, 10 per cent. free of income tax, it gives the shareholder 10 per cent. and relieves him from liability to make any payment to the Revenue or allowance to the company out of it. In other words, he receives 10 per cent. and an indemnity against a liability to pay part of it to the Revenue, or allow a deduction by the company of such part as the company has paid to the Revenue for income tax. He thus gets more than a 10 per cent. dividend. Further, if he be a person of limited income entitled to remission or abatement of income tax, he will in fact receive 10 per cent. and the income tax, or so much of the income tax as he reclaims from the Revenue authorities. The argument addressed to me has been that, inasmuch as under the machinery of the Income Tax Acts the corporation is assessed under sched. A, and pays income tax upon all its profits, the corporation has nothing out of which it can pay the corporator dividend beyond the balance which remains after the corporation has paid the income tax payable by the corporation; and that out of this fund it is entitled to give the shareholder not exceeding, say, 10 per cent. This argument, I think, rests upon a fallacy. The profits are not arrived at after deducting income tax. The income tax is a part of the profits—viz., such part as the Revenue is entitled to take out of the profits. A sum which is an expense that must be borne, whether profits are earned or not, must, no doubt, be deducted before arriving at profit. But a proportionate part of the profits payable to the Revenue is not a deduction before arriving at, but a part of, the profits themselves. I refer to Lord Blackburn's judgment in Last v. London

CHAS. DIV.]

ELLIS (app.) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (resps.).

[K.B. DIV.]

Assurance Corporation (52 L. T. Rep. 604; 10 App. Cas. 445). Under the Income Tax Acts all income has to pay the tax, but not to pay it twice over. If it has already been paid under sched. A, it is not payable again under sched. D. But that does not prove that the person who receives a distributive share of the fund does not bear income tax in respect of his ownership of shares in the company. The Act provides that he shall. The relevant machinery is that under sect. 40 of the Income Tax Act 1842; the company is chargeable, and its officer has to do the necessary acts and make the necessary returns on its behalf. By sect. 54 he is to prepare a statement of the profits, and the estimate is to be made on the amount of the profits before any dividend shall have been made thereof to the member, and the member is to allow out of such dividend a proportionate deduction in respect of the duty so charged. The words which here command attention are that the member is to allow the duty out of the dividend. This particular company is governed by sect. 60, No. III. (3), of the Act of 1842. That section goes on to repeat or reproduce, but not very accurately, some part of the matter which had already been dealt with by sect. 54, and the words as to the allowance of the proportionate deduction of the duty are not identical with the words of sect. 54. For the words in sect. 54, "all such other persons and corporations or companies," sect. 60 substitutes the words "all such persons, corporations, companies, and societies," and for the words "out of such dividends" substitutes the words "out of such produce or value." An argument has been based upon this, the object of which is to show that the persons who are to make the allowance under sect. 60 are not the members of the corporation, but the corporation itself, and that the words are intended to provide that the corporation shall make the allowance to its treasurer. This may be so, but I do not think it is. It is true that the draftsman has used a collection of nouns substantive which reproduce those used in the earlier part of the clause with reference to the corporation whose profits are being considered, and not the collection of nouns substantive previously used as describing the members to whom distributive shares are to be paid. But, as matter of construction, I think the person to allow under sect. 60 is the same person as he who is to allow under sect. 54—viz., the member. But the question is not, I think, vital, for, even if the suggested construction of sect. 60 be right, the liability of the members to make the allowance would still, as it seems to me, be enforced by sect. 54. I refer also to sect. 102 of the Act of 1842 and sect. 40 of the Act of 1853. When this company declared and paid a dividend of 10 per cent., the member would be bound to allow the corporation to deduct the income tax upon his dividend, and he would receive a net sum of less than 10 per cent. When the corporation declared and paid a dividend of 10 per cent. free of income tax, the member received a sum larger by the amount of the income tax, which is not then to be deducted. The whole question is, Are the profits thus divided among the shareholders in excess of 10 per cent. on the capital? I think they are. It is exactly as if the company declared a dividend of 10 per cent. and the amount of the income tax, so that when the statutory deduction of the income tax is made the shareholder shall have a clear 10 per cent. In my judgment the plaintiffs are right. I will therefore make the declaration asked for in the statement of claim, and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

ELLIS (app.) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (resps.) (a).

Metropolis — Drainage — Low-lying land — Dwelling-houses on—Houses capable of being drained by gravitation for greater part of year—Houses so situate "as not to admit of being drained by gravitation"—Permission of council for erection—Time for taking proceedings—London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccciii.), ss. 122, 200 (9).

The appellant erected ten houses, intended to be used as dwelling-houses, on low-lying land, the surface of which was below the level of Trinity high-water mark. During the greater part of the year these houses admitted of being, and were in fact, drained by gravitation through an intermediate sewer into a main sewer, which was an existing sewer of the London County Council; but for some days in the year, in times of considerable rainfall, the main sewer became full of flood water, and so the water in the main sewer, by closing a hinged flap at the junction of the intermediate sewer, kept the sewage back in the intermediate sewer and prevented it from going into the main sewer, and on those days the houses could not be drained into the main sewer. There was no other existing sewer of the council into which they could be drained by gravitation.

Upon informations under sects. 122 and 200 (9) of the London Building Act 1894 against the appellant for erecting, without the permission of the council, upon such low-lying land dwelling-houses which were so situate "as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council":

Held, that as the houses were capable of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council for the greater part of the year, the fact that for some days in the year they could not be so drained, owing to the flood water in the main sewer keeping back the sewage in the intermediate sewer, did not make them houses which were "so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council" within the meaning of sect. 122, and that therefore no offence under these sections had been committed by the appellant in erecting the houses without the permission of the council.

Held, further, that proceedings under these sections are in time if taken within six months from the erection of the buildings, though more than six months from the commencement of such erection.

CASE stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Woolwich Police-court.

On the 28th Jan. 1903 ten several informations were laid before the magistrate on behalf of the London County Council (the respondents) for that the appellant in each of the ten cases between the 29th July and the 30th Nov. 1902, at the south side of Cedar-grove, Charlton, in the borough of Greenwich in the county of London, did unlawfully erect otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Part II of the London Building Act 1894 a building to which Part II of that Act related—namely, did, without the permission of the London County Council, upon land of which the surface was below the level of Trinity high-water mark and which was so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council, erect a building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, whereby he became liable to the penalty prescribed by sect. 200 (9) of the London Building Act 1894. Upon each of these informations and in respect of each of the ten buildings a summons was served upon the appellant.

Upon the hearing of these ten summonses before the magistrate in Feb. and March 1903, the following facts were proved or admitted:—

The appellant was the owner of and the person who erected ten dwelling-houses situate on a piece of land at the south side of and running at right angles to Cedar-grove, Charlton. The position of these houses was shown on two plans, A and B, annexed to this case. Such houses constituted a terrace or row, and fronted on a length of roadway which had some time previously been constructed by the appellant in continuation of the line of Ransom-road, the ground upon which such houses were built being about 5ft. 6in. lower than the surface of such roadway.

The appellant commenced to erect such buildings as a whole on or about the 14th July 1902, and more than six calendar months before the informations were laid, and the buildings were covered in in the month of Nov. 1902. Prior to commencing the erection of such buildings the appellant gave notice in that behalf to the district surveyor of his intention so to do, but no permission of the respondents was obtained by the appellant. Before the buildings were commenced the appellant was told by the district surveyor that the land upon which such buildings were about to be erected was below Trinity high-water mark.

The row of ten houses had a continuous frontage of about 160ft. to the roadway, and the land on which they were built rose slightly from the north-west end of the row towards the south-east end.

The level of the lowest floor of the ten houses was 7ft. above Ordnance datum, and the land on which the houses were built was about 18in. or 2ft. below such lowest floor—that is, about 5ft. or 5ft. 6in. above Ordnance datum. Trinity high-water mark is 12½ft. above the Ordnance datum, so that such land was about 7ft. to 7ft. 6in. below Trinity high-water mark.

Provision was made by the appellant for draining the ten houses into a sewer of the borough of Greenwich (hereinafter referred to as the Ransom-road sewer), laid under Ransom-road, having a diameter of 15in., and falling towards and opening into the respondents' southern main outfall sewer, which ran underneath the Woolwich-road. The outfall sewer was of circular section, having an internal diameter of 11ft. 6in., the invert being 22ft. 6in. below the surface of the Woolwich-road. The inner or lower side of the arch at the top of this sewer was 5.53ft. above Ordnance datum, so that the appellant's land on which the houses were built was as nearly as might be on the same level as the inner or lower side of the arch of this sewer. The Ransom-road sewer was connected with the outfall sewer at a point about half-way up its side (that is, on its horizontal diameter), and the opening or junction was protected by a hinged flap which, when the outfall sewer became flooded, closed (or should close) automatically, and so prevented the metropolitan sewage flowing along the outfall sewer from passing up into the Ransom-road sewer.

At the point of inlet into the Ransom-road sewer of the drain provided as aforesaid by the appellant was a manhole marked B on the plan B, which manhole was situate 90ft. from the nearest and 250ft. from the farthest of the ten houses, and the length of the Ransom-road sewer from the manhole to its inlet into the outfall sewer in the Woolwich-road was about 350ft.

The Ransom-road sewer was constructed and connected with the outfall sewer in 1894 by the permission and sanction of and in accordance with the requirements of the respondents, pursuant to the Metropolis Local Management Acts. The outfall sewer was discharged and emptied by means of a pumping station at Crossness, on the south side of the Thames, erected for that purpose and under the control and management of the respondents.

The total length of the drain so provided by the appellant as aforesaid from the furthest off of the appellant's houses to the manhole was about 250ft., and the total fall of the drain in that distance from the level of the lowest floor of the houses to the bottom of the manhole was about 5½ft.—that is, 1in. in 4ft.

The drains of each of the appellant's houses were laid in the back gardens or yards in concrete at a depth, commencing from the furthestmost house, of 6in. below the surface, which depth increased with the fall of the drain towards the manhole.

The total fall of the Ransom-road sewer from the manhole to the outfall sewer, which was a distance of about 350ft., was 2ft. 7in.—that is, 1in. in 11ft.

The outfall sewer necessarily received much of the flood water of the metropolis, so that in times of flood, and even after moderate rainfall, it became full and surcharged. The effect of this condition of the outfall sewer upon the Ransom-road sewer was that at times of flood and moderate rainfall no sewage or drainage could pass away from the latter sewer at all, and it necessarily became more or less full. An instance of this was proved by a witness who laid the appellant's drain for him. This witness stated that in Oct. 1902 a flood took place, and the

Ransom-road sewer became so full that water was standing in the drain at a point about 45ft. south of the manhole, with the consequence that the cementing of the drain had to be suspended.

The respondents' engineers kept records of the height, determined by means of gauges placed in the outfall sewer, of the level of the water in times of flood, and they proved that on certain dates in the years 1900 and 1901 the flood levels determined by such gauges placed near Church-lane, Charlton, rose to heights above the Ordnance datum varying from 7ft. to 11½ft. All these flood levels were substantially above the appellant's land on which the houses were built, and if such flood were free to reach a corresponding level at the appellant's land, the latter would be flooded. The flap aforesaid in the outfall sewer at the inlet into it of the Ransom-road sewer would, however, normally prevent the contents of the outfall sewer from escaping into the Ransom-road sewer.

There was no evidence before the magistrate, save in the one instance above stated, as to how far in times of flood the water in the Ransom-road sewer rose, or to what distance towards or past the manhole the flooding or surcharging of or in the Ransom-road sewer or the appellant's drain extended.

There is no land in the county of London lying so low as to be below the bottom of the outfall sewer. It was not suggested that the appellant's land could be drained into any existing sewer of the respondents other than the outfall sewer.

Upon the above facts the respondents contended that the appellant's land did not admit of being drained by gravitation into the outfall sewer as then existing, and that the offence charged had been proved.

The appellant contended that the offence charged had not been proved, and that it was not proved that his land was so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the respondents; that the Ransom-road sewer was such a sewer; that in fact his land was drained by gravitation into the Ransom-road sewer, and also into the outfall sewer; that the respondents ought not to be heard to say that the drainage by gravitation was not proper and efficient by reason of the Ransom-road sewer being constructed and connected with the outfall sewer with the permission and sanction of the respondents as above stated in this case, or by reason of the use or management of the outfall sewer, and that the temporary non-escape in time of flood as aforesaid of the contents of the Ransom-road sewer into the outfall sewer did not prevent the land from being so situate as to admit of its being drained by gravitation within the meaning of the section.

The appellant further contended that the informations and proceedings were out of time, having been laid and commenced more than six calendar months after the commencement of the erection of the buildings.

Taking the facts as above set out, and considering all the circumstances of the case, the magistrate was of opinion and determined: (1) That the ten houses above mentioned were erected by the appellant upon land of which the surface was below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and that the same were intended to be used as dwelling-houses. (2) That during the greater part of the year the houses admitted of being and were drained by gravitation into the Ransom-road sewer and through that into the southern outfall sewer; but that for a substantial number of days in the year the drainage of the land upon which such houses were erected could not pass into the outfall sewer. (3) That the Ransom-road sewer, being a sewer of the Greenwich Borough Council, was not, but that the southern outfall sewer was, an existing sewer of the respondents within the meaning of sect. 122 of the London Building Act 1894, and that there was no other existing sewer of the respondents into which it was possible to drain the land. (4) That it was immaterial whether the impossibility of draining the land into the outfall sewer at certain periods, as above mentioned, was or was not due to insufficient pumping arrangements provided at Crossness by the respondents, or whether it was or was not due to the insufficiency or incapacity of the sewer, and that for the purpose of the section the sewer and the appliances connected therewith must be taken as they existed at the time the buildings were erected. (5) That, in view of the facts and circumstances set out in the second finding of the magistrate, the land, not being and not admitting of being constantly and effectually drained by gravitation into the outfall sewer, did not admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the respondents within the meaning of sect. 122 of the Act. (6) That the informations were laid and the proceedings commenced within six calendar months from the erection of the buildings, and therefore within the time prescribed.

He thereupon convicted the appellant in each of the ten and adjudged him to pay a penalty of 5*l.* on each of the ten summonses, with the further sum of 20*l.* for costs in respect of the first summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above statement of facts the magistrate came to a correct decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

The London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cexiii.) provides (Part 11, Dwelling-houses on low-lying land):

Sect. 122. It shall not be lawful for any person upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark and which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council to erect any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, or to adapt any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, except with the permission of the council and subject to and in accordance with such regulations as the council may from time to time prescribe with reference to the erection of buildings on such land. And the council may by such regulations (subject to appeal as hereinafter provided): (i.) Prohibit the erection of dwelling-houses or the adaptation of any buildings for use as dwelling-houses on such land or any defined area or areas of such land. (ii.) Regulate the erection of dwelling-houses or the adaptation of buildings for use as dwelling-houses on such land or any defined area or areas of such land. (iii.) Prescribe the level at which the under side of the lowest floor of any permitted building shall be placed on such land or any defined area or areas of such land, and as to the provision to be made and maintained by the owner for securing efficient and proper drainage of the buildings either directly or by means of a local sewer into a main sewer of the council. Any person seeking to erect any dwelling-house or any building any part of which is to be used as a dwelling-house, or to adapt any building or any part of a building for use as a dwelling-house, on any of such land shall make application to the council for a licence to erect the same, and the matter shall thereupon be referred to the chief engineer of the council, who shall decide whether and if so upon what conditions such erection or adaptation may be permitted.

Sect. 200 (9). Every person who erects or adapts or commences to erect or adapt otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Part II of this Act any building to which Part II of this Act relates shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and to a daily penalty not exceeding fifty pounds for every day after the conviction for the offence on which the building continues so erected or adapted without a licence, or on which default is made in observing or complying with any conditions of a licence under that part of this Act.

The arguments are sufficiently indicated by the contentions in the case.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Upon the point that has been taken that these proceedings were too late, I am clearly of opinion that there is no ground for interfering with the entertaining of the case by the learned police magistrate upon the ground that the proceedings were out of time. Sub-sect. 9 of sect. 200 says that the person "who erects," under this very section (namely, sect. 122), "or adapts or commences to erect or adapt otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Part II of this Act any building to which Part II of this Act relates shall be liable to a penalty." It is contended that because the appellant commenced the ten houses more than six months before the laying of the informations, although they were not completed until well within the six months, the proceedings were too late as the six months ran from the commencement of the erection. In my opinion that would give no effect to the words "erect or adapt," as distinguished from "commence to erect or adapt." The object of what I may call the double provision is obvious: it may be necessary to wait until the houses are completed in order to see whether they fall within the section or not. On the other hand, there may be a case in which it is quite clear that what is going to be done may be an infraction of the section, and in that case power is given to take proceedings as soon as work of that character is commenced. On the other part of the case I think the learned magistrate has gone too far; that is to say, that he has applied a test which is not laid down by sect. 122 of the statute. Sect. 122 says that "It shall not be lawful for any person upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark and which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council to erect any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house." The learned magistrate has found that the ten houses, which had been erected by the appellant, were on land of which the surface was below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and that they were also intended to be used as dwelling-houses, and that therefore prima facie the section applies. He then finds facts which I need not go through in detail, showing that the houses were at a level which admitted of their being drained by gravitation; and it is not disputed that if there were no other sewer or no other special construction or special use of the main outfall sewer in the Woolwich-road, the houses could be drained by gravitation into that sewer. Then the magistrate says this: "During the greater part of the year the said houses admit of being and are drained by gravitation into the Ransom-road sewer, and through that into the southern outfall sewer." Therefore, that the condition of the houses is such that they admit of being drained by gravitation is obvious and is so found, because they could not admit of being drained by gravitation in the ordinary sense of the word for part of the year and not for the whole of the year, though the magistrate goes on to say that "for a substantial number of days in the year the drainage of the land could not pass into the outfall sewer." Then he goes on to say that he thinks that it is immaterial as to why it would not pass into the sewer. It is in that respect that I think he has applied a wrong construction of the law, because it turns out and the fact is that this outfall sewer being very heavily charged in times of flood, or in times of excessive or even moderate rainfall, so much water comes down the sewer that the flaps which are made to shut with the pressure of the water close the mouth of the Ransom-road sewer, so that the water cannot go out of the Ransom-road sewer owing to the greater pressure of the water in the main outfall sewer. That does not make the house one which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation. What it does come to and mean is that on those particular days the main sewer is so used by the London County Council that the water will not go out into that sewer from the Ransom-road sewer. In my opinion it never was intended that the particular houseowner or landowner, whose houses are within the terms of the section, should be prevented from draining, because on certain days of the year the sewer is so used that water will not go out into the sewer; and, as I clearly pointed out in the course of the argument, really the question of the level of the houses has nothing to do with the case. We have to see whether the houses fall within the section or not as being below the level of high-water mark, because, assuming the level of the houses was 10ft. higher, still the same objection applies—namely, that on those particular days of the year the water would not go out of the sewer because it would be headed back owing to the pressure of water in the main sewer. I desire to say that no point is raised as to any improper construction of the drains of the houses with the Ransom-road sewer. I deal with this case solely upon the point raised—namely, that it is objected by the London County Council that, because the water in the Ransom-road sewer was on a certain number of days in the year headed back by the water in the outfall sewer, therefore the house was not one that is capable of being drained by gravitation, or so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation, into the existing sewer. I think as to that the learned magistrate was

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Highway—Local authority—Road not safe for traffic—Misfeasance—Liability.

The appellants, who were both the sanitary and the highway authority, dug a trench along a road under their control for the purpose of laying a sewer. When the work was completed they filled in the trench and opened the road for traffic. About a week afterwards the respondent was driving along the road in a cab at night. The driver found that the part of the road where the trench had been opened was soft, and crossed on to the other side, and ran into a heap of rubbish, with the result that the cab was overturned and the respondent was injured. The rubbish had been wrongfully deposited in the road without the permission of the appellants, but they knew that it was there, and had not lighted or fenced it. The jury found that the part of the road where the trench had been opened had been properly filled in, but had been rendered soft by subsequent rain, and was dangerous to traffic at the time of the accident.

Held, that the appellants were liable for the injury. Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported 67 J. P. 37, who had reversed a judgment of Phillimore J. upon further consideration. The action was brought in respect of personal injuries caused by the upsetting of a cab. The facts were as follows:—

The appellants were the sewer authority and also the highway authority for the borough of Shoreditch. Before and at the time of the accident to the respondent the appellants, as such sewer authority, were engaged in laying down a new sewer in Buttesland-street, which was within the borough, and under their jurisdiction. For the purpose of laying the sewer it was necessary to dig a trench 3ft. wide down the centre of Buttesland-street. The width of Buttesland-street was 24ft. from kerb to kerb, so that a space of 10ft. 6in. either side of the trench remained entirely undisturbed. Great Chart-street was a street which ran into Buttesland-street at right angles. At the date of the accident (April 1900) the condition of things in Buttesland-street was as follows—namely, to the west of Great Chart-street (or to the left hand of a person coming down Great Chart-street into Buttesland-street) the street was closed as the work of laying the sewer was in progress. To the east of Great Chart-street (or to the right hand of a person coming down Great Chart-street into Buttesland-street) the street was open as the work of laying the sewer was finished, the trench having been filled in about fourteen days prior to the accident, and the road having been open to the public about six days before the accident. On the night of the accident there was in Buttesland-street on the south side (or off side of a person driving down Buttesland-street from Great Chart-street), and close to the kerb and about fifty yards from Great Chart-street, a heap of rubbish, which had been improperly shot there by a carman not in the employ of the appellants, over whom they had no control, who had shot the rubbish in the street without any permission from the appellants. On the night of the accident the respondent was being driven home in a hansom cab. The driver came down Great Chart-street and finding that portion of Buttesland-street which was to his left hand closed turned to his right, intending to proceed down that portion of Buttesland-street which was open. In order to do so he crossed the site of the trench which had been filled in, and so got on to his near side of Buttesland-street. Thinking that the off side of Buttesland-street might be better than the portion he was on, he recrossed the site of the trench and so got on to his off side of Buttesland-street, and shortly afterwards he drove over the heap of rubbish, which upset the cab and caused the injuries to the respondent in respect of which this action was brought. The action was heard before Darling, J. and a common jury on the 1st Aug. 1901. At the end of the plaintiff's evidence the learned judge held that there was no evidence of misfeasance to go to the jury, and entered judgment for the appellants. The respondent appealed, and on the 14th Dec. 1901 the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial. The new trial took place on the 16th, 17th, and 18th April 1902 before Phillimore, J. and a common jury. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case the judge was asked to nonsuit, and stated that he should have done so had it not been for the decision of the Court of Appeal reversing the judgment of Darling, J., but that in view of that decision he should leave certain questions to the jury and take their answers. The following questions were put to the jury, who returned the following answers:

1. Was the left half of the road down Buttesland-street from Great Chart-street to Pittfield-street dangerous to traffic?—Yes, sufficiently to warrant the driver in crossing from the near to the off side.
2. Was it the part which had been excavated, or the part to the left hand of that which had been excavated?—Both, but chiefly the trench.
3. Was the work properly finished by defendants after the trench was completed?—Yes, it was properly finished at the time, but rain had spoiled it.
4. Did the cabman go over to the off-side owing to the work not being properly finished?—Yes. The foreman of the jury.—We do not intend to say that he went over to the off side because the road was not properly finished, but that he went to the off side on account of the state of the road.
5. Was the heap of rubbish put there by direction of the vestry or its servants?—No.
6. Was it put there by permission of the vestry or its servants?—No.

The jury added as a rider that the road was properly finished, but had become dangerous in the six or seven days since it was open to traffic.

MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF SHOREDITCH v. BULL.

The learned judge, after argument upon these findings, entered judgment for the defendants with costs. From this judgment the respondent appealed, and the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R. and Mathew, L.J.) upon the 1st Nov. 1902 (Romer, L.J. dubitante) allowed the appeal, and ordered judgment to be entered for the respondent.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C. and R. V. Bankes, for the appellants, contended that there was no evidence to support the view which the Court of Appeal took of the effect of the findings of the jury. There was no duty on the appellants to light or remove the heap of rubbish, and the holes on the near side of the road, if any, were only a nonfeasance, not a misfeasance. There was no evidence of negligence in filling in the trench, and it was not in fact in a dangerous state, or, if it was, it did not contribute to the accident. They referred to Montague Lush, K.C. and E. Lewis Thomas, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: I should be much grieved if any of the facts in this case were left so uncertain as to render it necessary for your Lordships to send it down for a third trial, the damages having been only to the extent of 50*l.*, and the expenses, I should think, already incurred in the two trials before coming to this House, amounting to a very considerable sum indeed, thrown upon the ratepayers. But I do not think that necessary, because I think that there is enough in the findings of the jury here to render it proper to affirm the judgment which has been given by the majority of the Court of Appeal. I am desirous of not going beyond the facts and findings in this case for more reasons than one, and among them, conspicuously, is the reason that I think that some propositions in respect to the non-liability of the surveyor, or the local board now representing the surveyor of highways, may be pressed too far. At the same time I wish to express no difference of view from that which has been expressed before in this House. When the question is raised in a direct form it may be worth while to consider whether or not that which has been described as an act of nonfeasance in several of the cases in which that proposition has been applied, I think a little too widely, may not be considered misfeasance; but it is enough for the present case to say that according to the authorities there is enough here to show that the act which was being done was an alteration of the normal condition of the road, and if there was anything wrong either in the mode of carrying out the work or in the period of time which was allowed to elapse between the opening of the road and its becoming firm, or if in any other way the thing that was being done was negligently done, or if there was evidence for the jury that it was negligently done within any of the decisions which have been cited to us, it was an act of misfeasance for which the local or road authority under whose authority the thing was done was responsible. I deprecate very much the notion that you can begin an operation which interferes with the ordinary and normal condition of the roads and then by reason of having different duties cast upon you you can treat that as a separate operation, so that at one point of time you may be responsible in one capacity or not responsible in one capacity and at another point of time you are, and you may hand over the completion of the operation to an authority which is not responsible at all. That would be a sort of metaphysical inquiry into which I am loth to enter. The person who alone could interfere with the structure of the road as it stood happens to be the person who is also responsible for the continuance of the road in a condition in which it shall not be permitted to be dangerous to the public; and in this case I absolutely decline to inquire at what particular point of time the liability as sewer authority ends and the liability as highway authority is supposed to begin. It is enough for me to say that the person sued was the person who interfered in the first instance with the ordinary structure and normal condition of the road and that was an act—not an omission to do an act but an act—and until the road was restored in its entirety to the proper and normal condition so that it could be properly and without undue risk traversed by the public at large, it seems to me that it would be idle to say that you could put your finger upon any particular point of time and say that the liability of the sewer authority began then and ended then, and then it was handed over to an authority which is not responsible for nonfeasance, and if that authority did nothing nobody is responsible at all. That is a process of reasoning to which I for one will not assent. The moment the structure of the road is interfered with, and it comes within the ambit of the operation commenced by the person who is entitled to interfere with the structure of the road, then, until that road is restored into the condition in which it was before that alteration of its structure began, it seems to me the person who interfered with it is responsible for a misfeasance. I do not deny that there is considerable difficulty in following the findings of the jury. For aught I know to the contrary the learned counsel who has last addressed us may be right in the conjecture which he has formed as to the influences which guided the jury in coming to their findings. I have nothing to do with that provided that the findings stand (and there is no application here and no desire, I should think, on either side for a new trial) and provided that the two learned judges in the Court of Appeal are right in construing the findings as they have done, and, although I think that a different view might be entertained, I certainly do not feel myself able to differ from their interpretation of those findings. Under those circumstances it becomes an ordinary case of interference with the road, the non-return of it into its normal condition, and an accident happening in the course of events, which but for that alteration in the normal condition of the road would not have happened. That seems to me, therefore, to be a sufficient chain of events to show that the person who interfered with the normal condition of the road is responsible for it until its return to a safe condition. It was not restored to the normal condition when the accident occurred, and therefore I think that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his verdict. Under those circumstances I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. Notwithstanding the able argument which we have heard this morning, I think that what was done must be regarded as one operation and by one body. So regarding it, I think that there was more than nonfeasance; there was misfeasance. I agree that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt myself if you look at it broadly and without those subtle distinctions which have been suggested to us, that this is a case of misfeasance and not of nonfeasance. There were three breaches of duty, so far as I can make out, or at all events there were three acts done—not merely omissions. There was breaking up the road and putting it into such a state that it was not fit for traffic; there was restoring the road and not restoring it so as to be fit for traffic; and there was leaving the cartload of rubbish there which it was the duty of someone on the part of the defendants to clear away (I do not say an actionable duty), and that was not done. Three wrongs do not make one right. It is more than omission. It is not as if they left the road alone; they did nothing of the sort. They first began by putting it out of a proper state of repair, and they never put it back into a proper state of repair.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Practice—Compromise—Distribution of fund among bondholders—Limitations of times for claims by absent parties.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Rigby and Stirling, L.J.J., Williams, L.J. dissenting), reported under the name of Collingham v. Sloper (84 L. T. Rep. 289; (1901) 1 Ch. 769), refusing to alter the form of an order for a compromise made by the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Lopes, and Kay, L.J.J.), under Order XVI., r. 9a), as reported in 71 L. T. Rep. 456; (1894) 3 Ch. 716, reversing a decision of North J. (69 L. T. Rep. 39; (1893) 2 Ch. 96).

The Saragossa and Mediterranean Railway Company by a trust deed dated the 6th Oct. 1887 created a series of 75,000 mortgage debentures or obligations, payable to bearer, of the nominal value of 500 pesetas (20L.) each, and secured by a mortgage or hypothecation of the line of the railway company from Puebla de Hija to San Carlos de la Rapita in the kingdom of Spain. Of these obligations 13,450 were issued by the railway company shortly after the creation of the series; and by agreement dated the 15th June 1888 they agreed to issue to the contractors for the construction of the railway the balance of the obligations (61,550). The sum of 431,016L. 9s. 10d. came to the hands of the London commissioners, representing moneys subscribed in respect of the obligations and interest; and after allowing for sums appropriated for redemption of bonds already drawn, and giving credit for moneys owing to them, they had in hand at the date of the scheme hereinafter mentioned the sum of 218,734L. 0s. 11d. In 1892 the respondents to this appeal commenced an action in the Chancery Division (Collingham v. Sloper) on behalf of themselves and all other the holders of such obligations to have the trusts on which the commissioners held the proceeds of such issue performed and carried into execution. A similar action was commenced in the same year by the Foreign American and General Investment Trust Company Limited (Foreign American and General Investment Trust Company Limited v. Sloper), and the same company also commenced another action (Foreign American and General Investment Trust Company Limited v. Sloper) for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the objects for which the money was subscribed by the public were no longer capable of being performed. The railway company was a defendant in each of such actions. On the 27th Jan. 1893 North, J. delivered judgment in the three actions (69 L. T. Rep. 39; (1893) 2 Ch. 96), declaring that the trusts in the deed of the 6th Oct. 1887 and other trusts constituted ought to be performed and directing certain inquiries. A scheme of arrangement or compromise was then prepared for the purpose of settling the rights of the various claimants to the funds in the hands of the commissioners, which then amounted to 218,734L. 0s. 11d. By this scheme it was provided (inter alia) that 153,457L. 10s. (part of the said sum in the hands of the commissioners) should be set aside for distribution in respect of the 61,383 (subsequently ascertained to be 61,275) outstanding obligations of the railway company when and so soon as the holders thereof should be thereby ascertained (being at the rate of 2L. 10s. per obligation) within fourteen days of the presentation of the same for payment upon such obligations being delivered up to be cancelled. A petition to sanction the scheme was refused by North, J.; but by an order of the Court of Appeal it was ordered that, the court being of opinion that the scheme was for the benefit of all the holders of the obligations who were not parties to the proceedings, the scheme should be carried into effect so as to be binding on all the holders of the outstanding obligations of the railway company (other than three persons who dissented therefrom but subsequently consented thereto), and that all further proceedings in the actions should be stayed, and that the commissioners, in case within twelve months from the date of this order all the obligations of the railway company should not have been surrendered, should lodge in court the residue of all moneys in their hands: (71 L. T. Rep. 456; (1894) 3 Ch. 716). There were now outstanding 1097 of such obligations, and the balance of the funds in court available for the payment of 2l. 10s. on each of such obligations now amounted to 3399l. 15s. 5d. New Consols. On the 20th Feb. 1901 the railway company served an originating notice of motion in the Court of Appeal for an order that a period of three months, or such other time as the court might think fit, might be limited within which the holders of outstanding obligations must come in under the scheme and accept the sum of 2l. 10s. per obligation, or that the holders of the obligations who did not come in and accept such sum within such time should be deemed to have elected not to take the benefit of the scheme, but to rely on the charge on the railway property comprised in such obligations and the trust deed of the 6th Oct. 1887, and that such holders might be excluded from the benefit of the scheme. The Court of Appeal refused the application, and the present appeal was brought from this refusal. The obligations were all payable to bearer, and were largely held in France, Belgium, and Spain, and, generally speaking, in very small amounts. It was not known who were the holders of the obligations which were now outstanding.

Upjohn, K.C. and Martelli appeared for the appellants.

Butcher, K.C. and Peterson for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships expressed an opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal could not be supported, and adjourned the case in order that the parties might come to some arrangement.

March 10.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case your Lordships thought it desirable that the parties should come to an agreement. They have now done so, and I will propose to your Lordships an order which will give effect substantially to that agreement: That the order appealed from be discharged, and that the cause be remitted back to the Chancery Division with directions (the railway company undertaking not to dispute the right of the holders of the outstanding debentures to a valid charge on the property of the railway) to make the order prayed for in the notice of motion substituting six months for three months, the order to be advertised forthwith in such form and in such papers as the master may approve, and that the costs of both parties as between solicitor and client be paid out of the fund in court.

Order appealed from discharged, and cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW SOUTH WALES v. DICKSON AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Grant of land—Reservation to grantor—Omission from subsequent grant—Effect.

In 1829 the Crown granted land adjoining the sea to a corporation, reserving (inter alia) "all such part of the said piece or parcel of land hereinbefore described as may be within 100ft. of high-water mark on the sea coast, or in any creek, harbour, or inlet." In 1830 the corporation, in execution of a previous contract, sold the land to D., through whom the respondents claimed, and D. executed a mortgage to the corporation to secure part of the purchase money, which was then unpaid. The land was conveyed to D. "to hold the same subject to the reservation and conditions in the now recited grant" (meaning the grant of 1829 from the Crown) "contained."

In 1833 the corporation was dissolved by Order in Council, and its property thereupon reverted to the Crown, "subject to all mortgages and contracts for sale previously lawfully made."

In 1840 D. paid off the mortgage, and the Crown granted the land to him. This grant made no mention of the reservation above mentioned, and described the land as being bounded on one side "by the water of" the "harbour."

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the effect of the grant of 1840 was to do away with the reservation contained in the earlier grant.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Stephen, Owen, and Pring, JJ.), who had affirmed a judgment of the Chief Judge in Equity (A. H. Simpson, C.J.).

The facts appear from the headnote above and from the judgment of their Lordships.

Asquith, K.C. and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellant, argued that the effect of the grant of 1840 was not to extinguish the title of the Crown to the land in dispute, which had been expressly reserved by the grant of 1829. The recitals in the deed of 1840 are inconsistent with the view taken in the courts below. As to the effect of a reservation in a Crown grant, see Attorney-General for New South Wales v. Milson, 16 N. S. W. Law Rep. (Cases at Law) 145; affirmed on appeal to the Judicial Committee, 23rd Feb. 1895, not reported.

The Real Property Acts of the colony, under which titles are registered, are not binding on the Crown.

Warmington, K.C. and R. J. Parker, for the respondents Dickson and Dodds, argued that under the grant of 1840 the whole piece of land passed to Dumaresq without any reservation. It

If it were not so, as the title to all the land in the colony comes ultimately from the Crown, the value of the Act would be destroyed.

F. Whinney, for Mr. G. H. Williams, the Registrar-General of the colony, who had been made a respondent, asked for his costs.

Vaughan Hawkins was heard in reply.

March 2.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

LORD LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether a small strip of land, 100ft. wide, adjoining the sea in Port Jackson, near Sydney, is the property of the Crown or of the defendants. This depends on the true construction of a grant by the Crown to one Dumaresq, dated the 12th Aug. 1840. In order, however, to understand this grant it is necessary to explain the position of the parties to it at that date. In 1826 a charter was granted by the Crown incorporating a number of persons by the name of the Trustees of the Clergy and School Lands in the Colony of New South Wales, with power to cultivate, sell, lease, and mortgage any lands which might thereafter be granted to them by the Crown (arts. 15, 17, and 20), and by art. 33 it was granted and declared that all lands theretofore set apart within the colony for the support of the clergy of the Established Church and known by the name of the Glebe Lands or by whatever other name the same might be known should, from and immediately after the death or resignation of the clergyman then in the occupation or enjoyment thereof, pass to and become vested in the corporation upon the same trusts and for the same purposes as their other estates. By art. 36 the Crown reserved to itself power to dissolve the corporation and to resume all the lands previously granted to it, but subject to all mortgages and contracts for sale previously lawfully made. It is common ground that the strip of land in question formed part of some glebe lands called St. Philip's Glebe, and that before Feb. 1828 arrangements had been made with the clergyman who held them for his resignation. It does not, however, appear when his resignation was formally completed. It was contended that by virtue of art. 33 of the charter the glebe lands resigned became vested in the corporation by virtue of the charter and without any further grant from the Crown. Perhaps this is so; but there is nothing to show when on this assumption the lands did become so vested. It is obvious that a grant reciting and recognising the resignation and accurately defining the lands to which the corporation had acquired a title would be useful and prevent disputes; and it appears that such a grant was in fact usually obtained, and was applied for in this case as early as Oct. 1827. The Government officials promised that proper deeds should be completed upon the receipt from the trustees of some formal document which was required. But no grant was in fact obtained before the sale which it is necessary now to notice. On the 14th Feb. 1828 part of St. Philip's Glebe was sold by auction by the corporation. The advertisements and conditions of sale stated that a transferable lease for twenty-one years with an option to purchase the fee would be granted to the highest bidder. The advertisements and conditions also contained the following words—viz.: "All clauses introduced in the grants to the trustees to be inserted in the leases and conveyances." It was also stated that lots 1 to 9 of the St. Philip's Glebe lands adjoined the sea. The strip of land in question formed part of lots 5, 6, and 7. Lots 5 and 6, containing about thirty-six acres, were bought by Mr. Dumaresq. No formal contract for this purchase is produced; but the relation of vendor and purchaser between the corporation and Mr. Dumaresq upon the above terms was then established, and a conveyance by the corporation to him was afterwards executed as will be stated presently. In the meantime the corporation obtained a grant of the glebe lands from the Crown. It is dated the 24th Nov. 1829. It recites that by certain instructions under the Royal Sign Manual the Government is empowered by the Crown to grant to the corporation certain lands in the colony and refers to the charter of incorporation, and a grant is made to the corporation of certain lands which are so described as to include the strip in question. But then came words which except it. The words are, "Excepting and reserving to His Majesty" lands for sites of towns or villages or other public purposes, and also reserving to His Majesty, his heirs and successors, all such part of the said piece or parcel of land hereinbefore described as may be within 100ft. of high-water mark on the sea coast, or in any creek, harbour, or inlet." Other reservations followed, but it is unnecessary to refer to them. The effect of this last reservation is not open to any serious controversy. If the strip in question belonged to the Crown at the date of the grant, the strip was excepted from the grant. The word "reserving" would operate as an exception. If, on the other hand, the strip belonged to the corporation under the charter, the reservation would operate by estoppel, and have the effect of a grant by the corporation to the Crown. After accepting this grant the corporation could not successfully claim the strip of land from the Crown. But Dumaresq was not a party to this grant, and any equitable title which he may have acquired was not affected by it. On the 1st July 1830 the corporation conveyed to Dumaresq the lands which he had purchased in 1828, and by the same deed he mortgaged them to the corporation for part of the purchase money. The conveyance recited the letters patent of 1826, and the grant by the Crown to the corporation of the 24th Nov. 1829, and the resolution to sell the lands comprised in that grant by public auction, and that, as the grant to the corporation had not then been made out, it had been proposed that the conveyances to the purchasers should be delayed until the grant to the corporation had been obtained, and that Dumaresq had become the purchaser of the piece or parcel of land hereinafter mentioned, "the same being parcel of the land comprised in the hereinbefore in part recited grant of the 24th Nov. 1829." The conveyance then went on to convey to Dumaresq thirty-six acres of land, "being parcel of the land comprised in the hereinbefore in part recited grant of the 24th Nov. 1829, and which said piece or parcel of land intended to be hereby granted and enfeoffed is bounded on the north-east by the water of Port Jackson Harbour." The rest of the conveyance and the remortgage contain nothing material. There is no reservation or exception in this deed, but the grant of 1829 is referred to not only in the description of the parcels, but in the recital, where the property granted by it is described as "bounded as in the said grant . . . mentioned to hold the same subject to the reservation and conditions in the now recited grant contained." This deed of 1830 is by no means so clear as it should have been. Its legal effect appears to their Lordships to have been that the purchaser only acquired so much of the land described as the corporation itself acquired by the grant of 1829. But the purchaser might very naturally think that the land which he agreed to buy extended to the water's edge, and that the land conveyed to him did the same. Both the particulars of sale and the conveyance of 1830 so describe it, and it is only by reference to the grant of 1829 that any doubt on this point arises. In 1833 the corporation was itself dissolved, and its property thereupon reverted to the Crown, as provided by art. 36 of the charter of 1826. On the 12th Aug. 1840 Dumaresq paid off his mortgage to the Crown, and the Crown made the grant which has given rise to this litigation. The grant is not a simple reconveyance of the property mortgaged which would be the ordinary form if all that was intended was to re-vest in the mortgagor what he had mortgaged to the corporation. The Crown not having been the mortgagee, recitals showing the title of the Crown to the mortgaged property and of the Crown Receiver to receive and give a good discharge for the mortgage money would be quite in ordinary course, and the grant in question contains recitals showing this. But there are passages in the grant which do more than this and require attention. In reciting the conveyance of 1830 the purchase by Dumaresq in 1828 is pointedly noticed, and the parcels conveyed by that deed are described as bounded by the water of Port Jackson, and the operative part of the grant runs thus:

Now know ye that in fulfilment and execution of the contract so made and entered into by the trustees of the clergy and school lands aforesaid for the sale and conveyance of the said lands to the said William Dumaresq, his heirs and assigns, as aforesaid and in consideration of the payment by the said William Dumaresq of the said several sums of 404*l.* and 32*s.* 12*s.* to the said Oswald Bloxsome as aforesaid on our behalf we do hereby grant and confirm unto the said William Dumaresq and his heirs all that said parcel of land estimated and accepted as aforesaid to contain thirty-six acres comprised in the hereinbefore in part recited indenture of the 1st July 1830 and hereinbefore particularly mentioned and described with the appurtenances thereto belonging to hold the said lands and other hereditaments with the appurtenances thereto belonging unto the said William Dumaresq, his heirs and assigns, to and for the end, intent, and purpose that the said term of 1000 years therein mentioned for the now residue thereof shall and may henceforth become merged and extinguished in the freehold reversion and inheritance of the said lands and hereditaments so by these presents and the hereinbefore part recited indenture conveyed to or otherwise vested in the said William Dumaresq and his heirs as aforesaid and wholly cease, determine, and for ever become void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

There is not a word here to show that the strip of land next the sea was excepted from the lands agreed to be purchased by Dumaresq in 1828 and conveyed to and mortgaged by him in 1830. So far is this from being the case, that those lands are described in this grant of 1840 as bounded by the waters of Port Jackson. Moreover, if a strip of 100ft. is deducted, thirty-six acres are a considerable over-estimate. The Chief Judge in Equity, before whom the case first came, decided that upon the true construction of this grant of 1840 the strip of land reserved to the Crown in the grant of 1829 was included in the land conveyed to Dumaresq by the Crown in 1840. The full court took the same view and affirmed his decision. From this decision the present appeal is brought. The respondents claim through Dumaresq. He sold to Gibson in 1841, who died shortly afterwards, and the respondents are the trustees of his will and purchasers from them. After Gibson's death—viz., in 1873—his widow applied to the Crown for permission to purchase and retain the mud flat in front of her land. This was refused. Later—viz., in 1880—being told that the land was not hers, she applied for a rescission of the reservation by the Crown, and ultimately a portion of it was acquired by her trustees from the Crown. In Oct. 1885 a certificate of title was obtained by Gibson's trustees, but with a note of the reservation of the 100ft. This led to much correspondence, and ultimately, in Nov. 1887, the note was removed, and Dickson and Dodds, the trustees, were registered as the owners of the land which Gibson bought, including the strip now claimed by the Crown. In June 1900 the Crown again claimed the strip of land notwithstanding the registration, and the present proceedings to enforce the claim were instituted on the 12th Dec. 1901. If their Lordships had come to the conclusion that the grant of 1840 had not included the sea frontage it would have become necessary to consider the very important question whether the registered title thus acquired was conclusive against the Crown. But their Lordships having arrived at the same conclusion as the colonial judges as to the effect of that grant, the question whether the Crown is bound by the registered title does not call for decision on the present occasion. Their Lordships have already stated that in their opinion the grant of 1829 did not convey to the corporation the strip of land in dispute or leave the ownership of it in the corporation if vested in them before. It remains to consider the other documents. Great reliance is placed by the Crown on the statement in the conditions of sale in 1828 that the leases and conveyances to the purchasers would contain "all clauses introduced in the grants to the trustees," and it is contended that the purchasers must have known from this that they would not obtain a sea frontage. Their counsel, on the other hand, contends that the statement that lots 1 to 9 adjoined the sea was misleading if the sea frontage of those lots was to be excepted; and that the words relied upon by the Crown, which were general words applicable to all the property, could not be applied to those lots or, if they could, should be confined to reservations for roads and mines and minerals and restrictions on user which the Crown might think proper to impose. Their Lordships feel considerable difficulty in deciding this controversy. If it was generally known in the colony in 1828 that Crown grants of land adjoining the sea always excepted a strip just above high-water mark, the purchaser could not reasonably complain that he was misled. But if there was not any such common knowledge, the purchaser would undoubtedly have great reason to complain if he did not obtain a sea frontage. The conveyance of 1830 is so worded as to be open to two constructions. The parcels conveyed by it are first of all described as comprised in the grant of 1829, but then they are said to be bounded by the water of Port Jackson. This is perfectly true in one sense—i.e., if the description of the parcels in the grant of 1829 is looked at—but the exception from them is disregarded. The legal effect of the conveyance of 1830, so far as the Crown was concerned, was only to pass the property which the corporation had power to grant; but as between the corporation and the purchaser it was so framed as to warrant him in supposing that he had got a grant of land coming down to the water's edge. Such was the doubtful state of the title to the sea frontage when the Crown made the grant of 1840. This grant is so worded as, in their Lordships' opinion, to remove the doubt to which they have referred, and the frame of the grant leads them to think it was intended to remove this doubt. The grant, in their opinion, conveys the land bought in 1828 down to the water's edge. It might, no doubt, have been made plainer, but their Lordships concur in the view taken of it by all the judges in the colony, and they will therefore humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal. The appellant must pay the costs of the respondents.

FITZMAURICE v. HESKETH. (a).

ON APPEAL FROM THE CONSISTORY COURT OF MANCHESTER.

Ecclesiastical law—Jurisdiction—Clergy Discipline Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32)—Offence against morality—Fraud.

Fraud is an "immoral act" within sect. 2 of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Consistory Court of the diocese of Manchester. The appellant, Fitzmaurice, a beneficed clergyman, was convicted at petty sessions of being a rogue and a vagabond under 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, as a gatherer or collector of alms under false and fraudulent pretences, and was sentenced to three months' hard labour. The quarter sessions on appeal confirmed the conviction. Complaint was lodged in the Consistory Court of the diocese of Manchester, charging the appellant with having been guilty of immorality within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892. He was then inhibited from his living by the Bishop of Manchester, and at the subsequent hearing before the Consistory Court was found guilty and deprived of his preferment.

By the Act of 1892 (sect. 2) it is provided that: "If a clergyman either is convicted by a temporal court of having committed an act constituting an ecclesiastical offence and the foregoing section"—which refers to indictable offences and matrimonial offences—"does not apply to him, or is alleged to have been guilty of any immoral act, immoral conduct, or immoral habit, or of any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, being an offence against morality and not being a question of doctrine or ritual," he may be prosecuted in the Consistory Court by any parishioner, or by the bishop, or by any person approved by him. By the definition clause 12 the expressions "immoral act," "immoral conduct," and "immoral habit" are declared to include "such acts, conduct, and habits as are proscribed by the 75th and 109th Canons issued by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury in the year 1603." The 75th Canon is as follows:

No ecclesiastical person shall at any time other than for their honest necessities resort to any taverns or ale-houses, neither shall they board or lodge at any such places. Furthermore, they shall not give themselves to any base or servile labour, or to drinking or riot, spending their time idly by day or by night playing at dice, cards, or tables, or any unlawful game; but at all times convenient they shall hear or read somewhat of the Holy Scriptures, or shall occupy themselves with some other honest study or exercise, always doing the things which shall appertain to honesty and endeavouring to profit the Church of God, having always in mind that they ought to excel all others in purity of life, and should be examples to the people to live well and Christianly under pain of ecclesiastical censures to be inflicted with severity according to the qualities of their offences.

Canon 109 says:

If any offend their brethren, either by adultery, whoredom, incest, or drunkenness, or by swearing, ribaldry, usury, and any other uncleanness and wickedness of life, the churchwardens or questmen and sidesmen, in their next presentments to the ordinaries, shall faithfully present all and every of the said offenders to the intent that they and every of them may be punished by the severity of the laws according to their deserts; and such notorious offenders shall not be admitted to the Holy Communion till they be reformed.

Bartley, for the appellant, contended that, though the conduct of the appellant was "immoral" in the general sense of the word, it was not an "immoral act" within the meaning of the Canons which are incorporated in the Act. See A Beneficed Clerk v. Lee (75 L. T. Rep. 461; (1897) A. C. 226), where the offence of simony and the making a false declaration under the Clerical Subscription Act 1865 were held not to be offences against morality within the Act of 1892. The Act draws a distinction between criminal offences, which are dealt with by sect. 1, and immoral conduct, which is dealt with by sect. 2. The appellant was not convicted on indictment, and therefore is not within sect. 1, and his conduct was not of the description aimed at by sect. 2 as explained by the Canons.

Cripps, K.C. and Hansell, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellant their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—Their Lordships have no doubt, and they have the assent of the right reverend prelates to that view, that this was an immoral act within the meaning of the statute, and was properly held to be so. They will, therefore, advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Feb. 3 and 4.

CHANDLER v. WEBSTER AND GIRLING. (a).

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Impossibility of performance—Money paid by one party—Right to recover back—Money due and payable before contract became impossible—Right to recover.

The defendants agreed to give the plaintiff the use of a room to view the intended Coronation procession on the 26th June 1902 for the sum of 141l., which was payable upon the making of the contract, and on the 20th June the plaintiff paid 100l. on account.

The intended procession being subsequently abandoned, the plaintiff claimed repayment of the 100l. as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, and the defendants claimed payment of the balance of 41l.

Held (reversing the judgment of Wright, J.), that the defendants were entitled to recover the unpaid balance which was payable before the procession was abandoned.

Held also (affirming the judgment of Wright, J.), that the plaintiff could not recover back the 100l. which he had paid.

APPEAL of the defendants from the judgment of Wright, J. at the trial of the action without a jury; and cross-appeal of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum of 100l. which he had paid to them as part of the price for the use of a room to view the Coronation procession, which was intended to take place on the 26th June 1901.

The defendants counter-claimed the sum of 41l., being the balance of the price which the plaintiff had agreed to pay them for the use of the room.

Early in June 1902 the plaintiff agreed with the defendants to take from them a room in Pall-mall for the purpose of viewing the Coronation procession, which was fixed for the 26th June. This agreement was partly verbal and partly contained in correspondence. There was no express agreement as to the time when the money was to be paid.

On the 20th June the plaintiff paid to the defendants the sum of 100l., part of the price of the room.

Subsequently it was announced that the Coronation procession was indefinitely postponed, owing to the illness of His Majesty the King.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover back the sum of 100l. as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, and the defendants counter-claimed to recover the sum of 41l., the unpaid balance of the agreed price of the room.

The action was tried before Wright, J. without a jury. The learned judge held that the plaintiff could not recover back the 100l. which he had paid, and he also held that under the contract the price was not payable until the day fixed for the procession, and that therefore the defendants could not recover the unpaid balance of the price.

The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff gave notice of a cross-appeal.

The Court of Appeal held that the proper inference was that, under the contract, the money became payable at or about the time of the making of the contract.

J. B. Matthews for the defendants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the defendants were not entitled to recover the balance of the agreed price. There was no express agreement as to the time when the price was to be paid, and therefore the proper inference is that it was to be paid at the time of the making of the contract. The correspondence shows that both parties considered that the money was payable at once. Inasmuch as the money was due and payable before the contract became impossible of performance—that is, before the procession was postponed—the defendants are entitled to recover the unpaid balance. The doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826), that, when the performance of a contract has become impossible through no default of the parties, no further performance can be required, but rights already acquired are left untouched, applies and shows that the defendants are entitled to recover the money which had become due and payable to them before performance became impossible. In Blakeley v. Muller and Co. (88 L. T. Rep. 90; (1903) 2 K. B. 760n.) Channell, J. said: "If the money was payable on some day subsequent to the abandonment of the procession, I do not think it could have been sued for. If, however, it was payable prior to the abandonment of the procession, the position would be the same as if it had been actually paid, and could not be recovered back, and it could be sued for." That passage was quoted and adopted by Lord Halsbury, L.C. in Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (89 L. T. Rep. 429; (1903) 2 K. B. 756).

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
Vol. XC., 2318*.

In Krell v. Henry (89 L. T. Rep. 328; (1903) 2 K. B. 740) it was held that it was a necessary inference from the circumstances of the case that the parties regarded the taking place of the procession as the foundation of the contract, and the balance of the price for which the plaintiff sued was not in fact payable until after the postponement was announced; and the decision was that the plaintiff could not recover the unpaid balance. In that case the defendant abandoned, in the Court of Appeal, his counter-claim to recover the deposit which he had paid. In Clark v. Lindsay (88 L. T. Rep. 198) the procession had in fact become impossible at the time when the contract was made and the money paid, though the parties did not know it. The defendants, therefore, are entitled to recover the unpaid balance of the agreed price, their right to payment having accrued before the procession became impossible; and the plaintiff cannot recover the money which he had paid before the procession was postponed.

Spencer Bower, K.C. and F. H. Colam for the plaintiff.—The learned judge was quite right in holding, upon the terms of the correspondence, that the agreed price was not to be payable until the procession took place. Payment of the price and the use of the room to view the procession were things to be performed at the same time. Therefore the unpaid balance clearly cannot be recovered, since the defendants' right to be paid had not accrued when the performance of the contract became impossible through the postponement of the procession. The plaintiff is entitled to recover back the money which he paid. He was not under any obligation to pay before the date of the procession, and he cannot be in any worse position because he has paid before he was bound to pay than if he had not paid. This is the simple and ordinary case of money paid upon a consideration which has wholly failed, and there is an implied contract to repay the money so paid. There is nothing in any of the cases which have been cited to show that the money which has been paid cannot be recovered back in this case as having been paid upon a consideration which has wholly failed. In Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) and Blakeley v. Muller and Co. (ubi sup.) the party sued had incurred considerable expense in preparing to fulfil the contract, and it could not be said that the consideration had wholly failed. In the present case there was no evidence that the defendants incurred any expense at all or did anything at all towards performance of the contract. The rule is that where, before any benefit has been derived by the payer, or any part of the contract has been performed by the other party, the performance of the contract becomes impossible without any default of either party, the consideration wholly fails, and an action lies for money had and received upon an implied contract to repay:

Knowles v. Bovill, 22 L. T. Rep. 70;

Chitty on Contracts, p. 76.

In this case the parties were clearly contracting with reference to the use of the room for the specific purpose of viewing the intended procession and the use of the room for that purpose was the foundation of the contract. This case is, therefore, within the decision of Krell v. Henry (ubi sup.). There is no case to be found in which a party to a contract which has become impossible of performance has succeeded in recovering any money which was agreed to be paid, but had not been paid when performance became impossible.

J. B. Matthews in reply.—The question whether the party sued for the recovery of the money paid to him has done anything under the contract is immaterial; that appears clearly from the judgment in Blakeley v. Muller and Co. (ubi sup.) There was no total failure of consideration, for the room might have let to another person if the contract with the plaintiff had not been made.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case is somewhat complicated by the fact that there are cross-appeals. The plaintiff agreed with the defendants to take from them a room to view the intended Coronation procession in June 1902 for the price of 141l. The plaintiff paid 100l. before the postponement of the procession was announced, leaving a balance due of 41l. The procession did not take place, and thereupon the plaintiff said that he was entitled to recover the 100l. which he had paid, and brought this action, and the defendants have counter-claimed for the balance of 41l. The learned judge at the trial held that both parties were wrong, and that neither of them was entitled to recover. The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff gave notice of a cross-appeal. I will first deal with the defendants' appeal, in which they contend that they are entitled to recover the balance of 41l. This question has been dealt with in several recent cases. It seems to me to be clear that the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826) applies to this case. The rule is that where there is no stipulation that the money is to be repaid if the event does not take place, or such a condition cannot be implied as having been agreed to by the parties, then, if further performance of the contract becomes impossible, the person who has paid his money upon the footing of the contract being performed in full must abide by the loss of what he has paid, and the other party must bear the loss of not being paid if any money has not become due and has not been paid; that is, that no further performance of the contract can be enforced because it has become impossible to fully perform it without any default by either party. How is that rule of law to be applied in the present case? Was it part of the bargain that the money should be paid before the date of the procession? If it was, then on the authorities it seems to me that the price can now be recovered. The plaintiff can be in no better position, because he did not pay the money when he ought to have paid it, that is, before the date of the procession. Then, did the bargain bind the plaintiff to pay all the money before the date of the procession? In my opinion the contract did oblige the plaintiff to pay all the money before the date of the procession, and it was not a condition precedent to the obligation to pay any part of the money that the procession should take place. Upon the correspondence I think it clear that it was understood between the parties that the money should be paid immediately, or at any rate within a reasonable time before the date of the procession; it was no part of the bargain between the parties that the money should not be paid until the procession took place. That is my view of the correspondence. If that is so, the law as established by the authorities which have been cited is that if the obligation to pay is by the contract made not to arise until after the event, then the obligation to pay is discharged if the event does not take place; but if by the bargain the money was to be paid at first, then the parties are left as they were and the person who was bound to pay before the event must pay though the event does not take place. In my opinion the plaintiff was bound to pay before the event, and, therefore, the defendants are right in their appeal. Wright, J. was of opinion upon the correspondence that it was a condition precedent to the obligation to pay that the procession should take place, and that therefore the balance of the price was not recoverable. For the reasons which I have given I think that is not the true view of the bargain between the parties. The rights of the parties are to be ascertained upon the footing that all the money was to be paid before the procession was abandoned, and therefore the defendants must succeed upon their counter-claim. As to the claim of the plaintiff to recover back the 100*l.* which he paid, I have already to some extent dealt with that question. The plaintiff contends that the money has been paid upon a consideration which has wholly failed; that is, that the condition upon which it was paid was that there should be a procession, and that therefore there has been a total failure of consideration. That raises a question of some difficulty, and one which has been dealt with in several cases. The principle of those cases is the principle for which Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) is the leading authority. That case decides that, if that which is the basis or central consideration of a contract becomes impossible of performance, from that time the contract need not be further performed by either party, but that the contract is left good up to that time; that it leaves as done all that has been done, but discharges the parties from any further performance. That is important in the present case, because if the contract was wiped out the money would have to be paid back, as upon a total failure of the consideration. That is not so in cases to which the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) applies; the contract is not annulled altogether, but the parties are only relieved from any further performance. The rule which does apply is that the parties must stand where they were at the time when the event became impossible. That is, no doubt, an arbitrary rule. It was adopted because it would be impossible to work out what the exact rights of the parties ought to be if the court tried to re-adjust them upon the footing of the contract having become impossible of performance. It being impossible to re-adjust the rights, the law says that all that has been done must be treated as done, but that nothing further need be done. I think that Wills, J. made some valuable observations on the point in Blakeley v. Muller and Co. (88 L. T. Rep. 90; (1903) 2 K. B. 760*n.*), where he said: "The decision in Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) is correctly summarised in Leake on Contracts, 4th edit., p. 494, thus: 'Where a contract was made for the erection of machinery upon the premises of one of the parties, to be paid for upon completion, and in the course of the work the premises were destroyed by fire, it was held that both parties were excused from further performance, and no liability accrued on either side.' That decision is, in my opinion, distinctly in point. The argument for the plaintiffs must be that the contract was rescinded ab initio. There is no authority to warrant that contention, and I cannot think it well founded. The process of constructing a hypothetical contract by supposing what terms the parties would have arrived at if they had contemplated the possibility of what was going to happen is, to my mind, very unsatisfactory. It is very difficult to construct such a contract for them. Probably in the present case the defendants would have stipulated for compensation for their outlay, and the plaintiffs for a return of their money; but it is impossible to say with any certainty what the result of their bargaining would have been. In Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) there is some sort of suggestion that a contract might be constructed for the parties, and I do not say that, if the facts were clear enough, it could not be done; I only say that it is a very difficult thing to do." The learned judge there points out the reasons why the contract is obliged to stop at the actual position of the parties when further performance of the contract is prevented. That is clearly the principle adopted in that case, and also in the case in the Court of Appeal, Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (89 L. T. Rep. 429; (1903) 2 K. B. 756), where the Lord Chancellor adopted a passage from the judgment of Channell, J. in Blakeley v. Muller and Co. (ubi sup.), which clearly supports what I have said, that where the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) applies the line is to be drawn at the point of time when further performance becomes impossible, and that what has been done is not to be disturbed, but nothing further is to be done. For these reasons I think that the judgment of Wright, J. as to the claim of the plaintiff was correct, and that the cross-appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Although it is a difficult task to attempt, I will venture to state in a comparatively brief form what seems to me to be the result of the authorities in this class of case. Where there is an agreement based upon the assumption of both parties that a particular event will take place, and that event is the foundation of the contract, then if there has been no default by either party, and owing to circumstances not in the contemplation of the parties when the agreement was made, it happens before the event that the event cannot take place as contemplated, the parties are both freed from all subsequent obligations under the agreement. Except in a case where the contract can be treated as rescinded ab initio, any previous payments made, or rights acquired, are not to be disturbed. Upon the facts the present case falls within that principle. The agreement was one of such a kind that, when it turned out that the procession could not take place, all parties were freed from any further obligations under it. In my opinion it was not a contract which could be treated as rescinded ab initio. Therefore any rights which had previously accrued to either party remained untouched. For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, it was a right of the defendants before the procession was postponed, to receive payment of 141*l.* from the plaintiff. Therefore the defendants are entitled to recover the unpaid balance of that sum, and their appeal must succeed; and the cross-appeal must accordingly fail.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that it was intended that the 141*l.* should be paid shortly after the making of the agreement. That is made quite clear by the correspondence which has been read. Therefore the decision of Wright, J. as to what was the contract was wrong. That being so, it follows that the defendants are right in their appeal. Then there is the cross-appeal of the plaintiff. He is endeavouring to get back from the defendants the money which he has paid to them. I see no ground whatever for saying that the money was paid upon any understanding that it was to be repaid if the procession did not take place. It is not to be adjudged that that money is to be paid back, unless there is satisfactory evidence of the intention of the parties that it should be payable back if there was no procession. I agree, therefore, that the defendants' appeal must succeed, and that the plaintiff's appeal must fail.

Appeal allowed; cross-appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Nov. 30 and Dec. 2, 1903.

Re BROWN; INGALL v. BROWN. (a)

Will—Condition—Marriage against mother's wish—Consent given—Power of retraction.

*By a codicil made in 1891 the testator directed that, in the event of his youngest daughter marrying against her mother's wish, a legacy of 500*l.* and all her share of moneys from the estate were to be settled on her for life, with remainder to her children, and, failing children, were to be divided between her brother and sister. In May 1893 the daughter became engaged with the consent of her parents, their consent being given on condition that the marriage was put off for two years, as the intended husband was not at the time of the consent in a position, as the parents considered, to marry. The testator died in Feb. 1895. The engagement was still recognised by the widow, but she stipulated that the marriage should not take place until the following August, six months after the testator's death. To this the daughter agreed. Subsequently there were disputes between the daughter and the mother, mainly as to the form of the settlement. The daughter left her mother's house and was married in June. The day before the marriage the mother wrote withdrawing her consent.*

Held, that the consent to the marriage was given with full knowledge of all the circumstances, and nothing had occurred subsequently which justified its retraction; that the refusal of consent by the mother had reference to the date fixed for the marriage and not to the marriage itself; that the daughter had not married against her mother's wish, and that she was absolutely entitled to the legacy and to her share in the testator's residuary estate.

Merry v. Ryves (1 Eden, 1) and Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley (10 Ves. 230) discussed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will made in Aug. 1888 testator gave all his property, real and personal, to trustees, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease he devised and bequeathed the same unto and to be equally divided between "all and every my children, sons and daughters, who shall be living at the time of the decease of my dear wife and the issue of them as shall be dead, such issue nevertheless taking only the share which their deceased parent would have been entitled to in the event of such parent surviving my dear wife to and for their own use and benefit absolutely." By a codicil, also made in 1888, testator gave several legacies, including one of 500*l.* to his daughter Lillias. In 1890 or 1891 the testator made a second codicil, in the following terms: "Since writing the above, my last will, I have to add that it is my wish that, in the event of my youngest daughter, Lillias, marrying against her mother's wish, she shall not be paid the above legacy of 500*l.*, but shall receive only the interest of the same half-yearly Government annuities, this also to apply to all her share of moneys from my estate, and at her death the same to be invested for her children; should she have no issue, then at her death her share of the estate to be divided equally between her brother Kenneth and her sister Mabel."

Some time prior to the date of this second codicil there was a possibility of the plaintiff becoming engaged to a gentleman other than her present husband, who was not considered desirable by the testator and his wife.

In May 1893 the plaintiff became engaged to her present husband, and the engagement was made known to the testator and his wife, and their consent was given to the same, provided that the wedding was put off for two years, as they did not consider that the intended husband's financial position was such as to enable him to marry. With the consent of the parents the engagement was made public, so that the young people were put in the position of an engaged couple, not only as between themselves, but also in the face of the world.

Some time prior to the testator's death his attention was directed to the fact that the intended husband, Mr. Ingall, who was on the Stock Exchange, had had some losses in business, and also that there was a possibility that circumstances of this kind might prevent the marriage from taking place as soon as had been originally anticipated; but up to the time of the testator's death nothing was said or done to cancel the engagement or to cause any withdrawal of the consent that had been given.

After the testator's death, which took place in Feb. 1895, the engagement was still recognised by his widow, but she stipulated that the marriage should not take place until the following August, and this was agreed to. Soon afterwards the mother became aware for the first time of the amount of Mr. Ingall's liabilities, and disputes arose between the daughter and her mother mainly about the form of the settlement to be executed by the daughter on her marriage. Correspondence passed between the solicitors advising the daughter and her intended husband and the mother's solicitors as to the settlement, the main subject of dispute being whether the daughter should have a power by will, independently of her mother, to give her intended husband a protected life interest in the income of her property. The mother insisted on a settlement, and on the exclusion of the intended husband from any interest in her daughter's fortune. The intended husband was willing that everything should be settled upon the daughter and her children, but the daughter considered that her mother's contention was unreasonable, and eventually she left her mother's home to stay with a relation, and the marriage was arranged for the 22nd June 1895.

On the 21st June the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the mother's solicitors as follows:

We repeat again the offer made in our letter of yesterday, that her property should be settled, and that she should have a power by will to give her husband a protected life interest. There is no time to prepare a marriage settlement, but marriage articles could easily be drawn by you and signed either to-day or even to-morrow morning.

The reply to this was:

We have seen our clients, and can only repeat what we said yesterday, that, having regard to all the circumstances and particularly to the fact that the wedding has been fixed for to-morrow, Mrs. Barclay Brown refuses her consent to the marriage, and that Miss Barclay Brown is therefore marrying against her mother's wish.

The daughter was told the contents of this letter, but nevertheless the marriage took place on the 22nd June 1895.

The trustees of the testator's will had invested the legacy of 500*l.* in Consols, and had paid the income of it to the plaintiff from the date of the marriage to the present time.

This originating summons was taken out by the plaintiff for the determination by the court of the questions whether, upon the true construction of the will and codicils and in the events that had happened, she was now absolutely entitled to the legacy of 500*l.* and to the share in the testator's residuary estate in the event of her surviving her mother.

The respondents to this summons were the present trustees of the will, the plaintiff's brother and sister, and the two infant children of the plaintiff's marriage, who had been added by amendment before the case came into court.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. and F. Cassel for the plaintiff.—A consent to a marriage can only be withdrawn for just and exceptional reasons:

Lord Strange v. Smith, Amb. 263.

The testator gave his consent to the marriage, as did also his widow after his death. The court has always put a favourable construction on conditions in restraint of marriage in order to prevent a forfeiture:

Daley v. Desbouverie, 2 Atk. 261;

Campbell v. Lord Netherhill (referred to in Berkley v. Ryder, 2 Ves. Sen. 534).

The case of Merry v. Ryves (1 Eden, 1) is exactly in point. It was there held that where consent to marriage was obtained without any fraud or misrepresentation such consent could not be withdrawn out of mere caprice. Consent was substantially given. The plaintiff's mother consented to the marriage, provided it did not take place within six months of the testator's death; her objection was not to the marriage, but to the time that was fixed for it. In Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley (10 Ves. 230) a conditional assent was given and the condition was not performed. In this case the only condition of the consent to the marriage was that it should be deferred for two years, and that condition was carried out. The consent so given could not be retracted, and the marriage did not take place "against the wish" of the mother. The second codicil does not take effect, for since the codicil was executed the testator had himself consented to the marriage, so that the widow's consent became immaterial.

Parnell v. Lyon, 1 V. & B. 479; 12 R. R. 274.

The plaintiff is absolutely entitled to the legacy of 500*l.* and to her share of the residue if she survives her mother. They also referred to

Re Smith; Keeling v. Smith, 62 L. T. Rep. 181; 44 Ch. Div. 654;

Levett, K.C. and A. F. Peterson for the defendant Kenneth Barclay Brown.—The marriage took place against the mother's wish, and the second codicil is therefore operative. The decisions in Lord Strange v. Smith (ubi sup.) and Daley v. Desbouverie (ubi sup.) seem to have been based on the ground that the consent was fraudulently withdrawn by the trustees. See Clarke v. Parker (ubi sup.).

The testator left the codicil unrevoked in order that his widow might be able to protect his daughter should she make an improvident marriage. The mother was not satisfied with the terms of the proposed settlement and refused her consent, as she had a right to do. When the circumstances as to the husband's financial liabilities came to her knowledge, the mother had a perfect right to retract her consent even if she had originally consented:

Sampson for the plaintiff's infant children.

Cassel, in reply, stated that the plaintiff and her husband were willing that the plaintiff's share in the testator's residuary estate should be settled on the terms proposed at the time of the marriage.

BYRNE, J.—The marriage took place on the 22nd June, and then the question arose whether under this codicil the settlement which was made by the testator in the event of marriage against the mother's wish applied, or whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the marriage ought not to be deemed a marriage with consent. Now, in reference to this matter, several of the older authorities have been referred to in reference to clauses of forfeiture upon marriage without consent, and this much one gathers from the authorities without much difficulty. It is observed by Stirling, J. in Re Smith (ubi sup.) that from an early period the court, in dealing with cases of this kind, has treated the consent to be given to a marriage as a matter, not of form, but of substance; and where it has been found that substantially the consent has been given, it has not looked very minutely into the form in which the consent was given. Here there is no question about the original consent having been given, and having been given in the lifetime of the father. Before I mention the other cases, there are two points that have been referred to deserving of consideration. One is that the codicil operates as from the death of the testator. He had known for nearly two years before his death that there was a subsisting engagement between his daughter and Mr. Ingall, and, as Mr. Levett said, it is true that the testator, if he no longer desired that to have any operation, would have made a fresh codicil or revoked the existing one. You may also say that the testator may have had in mind that circumstances might arise under which the subsisting engagement would be broken off, and that the young lady might intend to contract a new marriage, which would be a proposed marriage similar to that which apparently he had objected to before any question of the engagement to Mr. Ingall came on; but after all, though it is right to see what the circumstances were at the time when the codicil was executed, what I have to do is to construe it as it stands, and, as the document is before me, to see what the operation of it was. The other observation was this, that this is not a forfeiture clause in the sense that all the interest conferred upon the young lady was to go over to somebody else upon the event happening, but in fact it is a provident disposal of his own property by way of settlement in case of an imprudent marriage being made. I may say that some of the cases that have been cited, in one at least (more I think), the clause of forfeiture was not one giving away the whole of the interest that had been originally given. One case particularly, I think, was giving the interest to the lady for her separate use independently of her husband; but it is a fair observation to make that this is not one of those strict clauses of forfeiture depriving the daughter of all interest under her father's will. With those remarks I will now consider how the authorities stand with reference to the withdrawal of the consent once given. The first case I refer to is Merry v. Ryves (ubi sup.). In that case there were trusts "to raise by sale or mortgage 1000*l.* each for the sisters of George Ryves (of whom the plaintiff's mother was one), to be paid them respectively, at and upon their respective days of marriage, so long as they respectively married with the consent of the said George Ryves, Ann Ryves, their mother, and Thomas Heysham, and the survivors or survivor of them; but in case any or either of them should marry without such consent, it was declared that she or them so marrying should not receive such 1000*l.*, neither should any money be raised for or paid to her or them so marrying without consent." From the evidence it appeared that the plaintiff's father was a man of fortune and had paid his addresses to a Miss Ryves. He wrote to Mr. George Ryves, her brother, asking for his consent, and George Ryves said: "The proposal he made, though late, he should not oppose; that his character and circumstances were extraordinarily good; that he should leave the management of the settlement to Mr. Brucer, and that he would abide by Mr. Brucer's agreement on the settlement." The articles were prepared; the mother and trustee consented, the mother being a witness. Then: "Before the marriage some differences arising between Mr. Merry and the brother, the latter absolutely forbade the marriage; and it appeared that Mr. Merry, in a letter to the brother, gave up his addresses and wished the lady a better husband. Some time after, however, without any further application to the brother, the marriage was held, and now, the plaintiff's father and mother being dead, and the plaintiff the only child of the marriage, the question was whether he is entitled to have the 1000*l.* raised and paid to him." The Lord Keeper (Lord Henley), in giving judgment, says: "The court has always, in cases of this nature, considered the question of consent with great latitude, adhering to the spirit and not the letter. The maxim Qui tacet satis loquitur has therefore been respected, and constructive consents have been looked upon as entitled to as much regard as if conveyed in express terms." And then later he says: "I must consider what appears to have been done by Mr. George Ryves as a consent given by him to Mr. Merry's marriage. The question then will be whether such consent could be afterwards retracted; and I am of opinion that it could not, though I think that it might have done if it been obtained through any deceit or fraud; but nothing of that kind appears, or is even imputed, in the present case. Here is no suppressio veri or suggestio falsi, or any misrepresentation whatsoever. A plain constructive consent is given on a settlement being made, and this is referred to Mr. Brucer; and, though there was afterwards some altercation about the settlement, yet a reasonable one is made. Here is 3000*l.* settled for her 1000*l.*, and the whole is done with the approbation of Mr. Brucer, which makes the consent pure ab initio." That is to say, the condition that was imposed was fulfilled. Then in the next paragraph he says: "It must be taken, therefore, that there was a consent; and this consent being pure ab initio, not obtained by any fraud or misrepresentation, I am of opinion that it could not be retracted. It would otherwise be a most cruel thing to suffer young persons to contract and entertain affection, and then ad libitum withdraw the consent." Then, in Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley (ubi sup.), Lord Eldon, L.C., says, in the course of his judgment, after referring to a certain passage in the case of Farmer v. Compton (1 Rep. Ch. 1): "These are very material words. for it would be very dangerous, as a general principle, notwithstanding all the colour there is for saying it has been acted upon, to hold that if at a particular time a person in loco parentis as a guardian, upon a conscientious sense of duty, thinks himself required to give consent and previously to the marriage is duly informed of circumstances that ought to have operated at first to make him withhold his consent, if he has once given it, he shall not afterwards alter his mind. The cases have gone this length, that, if consent is once given, it shall not be withdrawn by adding terms that do not go to the propriety of giving the consent"; and then he proceeds to deal with the case of Lord Strange v. Smith (ubi sup.). Now, what I understand to be the true meaning which underlies the observation which I have just read from these passages is this, that it must be justifiable for persons in loco parentis to change their minds if circumstances come to their knowledge in respect of the proposed husband which, if they had been within their knowledge at the time the consent was given, would have fairly and properly operated to induce them not to give their consent; and that then the rule about non-retractation would not be held to apply. On the other hand, I think this also is to be gathered—that a retractation of consent must not be, as was expressed in one case, ad libitum, or, as it was, I think, expressed in another case, a mere caprice; but in arguing this case the parties representing the mother were compelled to put their case as high as this—namely, that there was what I may term an absolute power on the part of the mother to express her wish against the marriage, notwithstanding the previous consent. Now, there was a consent given by the father and the mother. There is no suggestion of any want of moral character or the existence of any circumstance of that nature which would have prevented the parents giving their original consent. The one thing there could be said was that to the mother at least, and perhaps to the father, the amount of the indebtedness of the young man became known for the first time after the testator's death; and there is this one other thing to be said, that the young people had assented to what the mother told them she should make a condition—namely, that the marriage was not to take place until August. I must read this clause fairly, and I could not avoid seeing, looking at it as a matter of substance, that there was a consent given; that it was not against the mother's wish that the marriage should take place, but that it was against the mother's wish that the marriage should take place modo et forma, as it in fact did take place. There was also this, that she was determined, unless a settlement was made and in the form she required, that the marriage should not take place. In substance, therefore, so far as the marriage itself was concerned, it was in accordance with the consent and the wish of the mother that it should take place, and I think that in construing a clause of this description it would be too harsh to say that the marriage having taken place, in accordance with a wish that a marriage should take place, that the fact of its taking place at a time not long anterior to that which had been stipulated for should impose the forfeiture on the parties. Now, with reference to the question of the settlement, I am far from saying that it is not part of the duty of a parent to see that a proper settlement is made; how far I am at liberty to go into this question about the reasonableness or unreasonableness I am not sure, but, as the point has been gone into by both parties, I think, for the sake of showing that this was not a capricious thing, I should say that the conclusion I have come to is this—that, so far as the settlement part of the matter is concerned, the reasonableness when the ultimate offer came on the day before the marriage lay on the side of the daughter rather than of the mother. The true objection was at last that the marriage took place before the expiration of six months from the death of the young lady's father. I have nothing to do with the question of whether it would not have been in better taste for them to have waited the necessary time; I have simply to deal with the question of the legal result of what has been done. I am bound to say this, having made this observation, that it does not appear upon the evidence that the unfortunate strained relationship between the parties had preyed upon the health of the daughter, and there was some reason for hastening the marriage and putting an end to that strain. On the whole, therefore, having regard to the principle that I think I can gather from the cases which have been cited before me, I think that no forfeiture has operated under this will. As I have said, I, of course, decide it in accordance with the legal rights of the parties; but I am glad to be able to think that, from the statement of counsel made to me, the husband is prepared to do that which I should have expected any honourable man would have been prepared to do—namely, now to make a settlement which would be substantially in accordance with that which was offered in the letter written by his solicitors on the day before the marriage.

Re JORDAN; HAYWARD v. HAMILTON.

Practice—Administration action—Parties—Trustees—Representation of trust estate.

An action for breach of trust was brought by a beneficiary under a marriage settlement against the executors of one of the trustees, but not the surviving trustee of the settlement. The surviving trustee was also dead, and no new trustees of the settlement had been appointed by the person in whom the power was vested.

Held, that the representatives of the surviving trustee must be added as defendants, or that new trustees of the settlement must be appointed and added as defendants.

ACTION brought by a beneficiary under a marriage settlement dated the 11th Dec. 1869, and made between Louis Napoleon Hayward of the first part, Jane Jordan of the second part, and Charles Jordan and Daniel Ludlow of the third part, for replacement by the defendants out of the estate of Charles Jordan, deceased, of a sum equal to the value of the trust properties lost by the breaches of trust of Charles Jordan, deceased, and, if necessary, the administration of the real and personal estate of Charles Jordan.

The statement of claim alleged:

That Charles Jordan, in breach of his duty as trustee, allowed Louis Napoleon Hayward to become possessed of the trust properties and securities or the proceeds of sale thereof, amounting in value to 1600*l.* or thereabouts, and to realise and dispose of the same for his own purposes.

Charles Jordan died on the 29th April 1882.

The defendants were the executors of his will, dated the 13th Sept. 1880, and proved, with the codicil thereto dated the 7th Oct. 1881, by the defendants at Llandaff on the 29th Dec. 1882.

Daniel Ludlow died on the 8th June 1886, and no new trustees of the settlement had been appointed.

Re JORDAN; HAYWARD v. HAMILTON.

[CHAN. DIV.]

L. N. Hayward died on the 21st June 1885, leaving Jane Hayward surviving.

By deed of appointment dated the 28th Aug. 1901, Jane Hayward, by virtue of the power in that behalf contained in the marriage settlement, appointed the trust properties and securities and the proceeds thereof in favour of the plaintiff, subject to her own life interest.

The power to appoint new trustees of the settlement was vested in Mrs. Hayward, and she was prepared to exercise it. The plaintiff claimed: (1) a declaration that the defendants, as such executors as aforesaid, are liable to make good the settlement moneys lost by the said breach of trust of the said Charles Jordan; (2) that a sum equivalent to the said sum lost be ordered to be set aside and invested as this honourable court may direct to answer the said loss; (3) if necessary, an account of the sums so lost by the said breach of trust; (4) if necessary, the administration of the real and personal estate of the said Charles Jordan. Further and other relief and costs.

The only defendants to the action were the executors of Charles Jordan.

By their defence they submitted that Jane Hayward and the legal personal representatives of Daniel Ludlow were necessary parties to the action.

On the action coming on for trial, a preliminary objection was taken that the trustees of the settlement ought to be represented, and that for that purpose either the representatives of the surviving trustee should be added as defendants, or that new trustees should be appointed and added as defendants.

Norton, K.C. and Bailhache for the plaintiff.

Rowden, K.C. and T. L. Wilkinson for the defendants.—The relief asked by the statement of claim cannot be granted in the absence of the trustees of the marriage settlement or the representatives of the last surviving trustee. Ludlow's representatives are the trustees for the purposes of administration, although they may not have actually accepted the trusts. The plaintiff can only obtain this money by administration. The case nearest in point is Re Harrison; Smith v. Allen (64 L. T. Rep. 442; (1891) 2 Ch. 349); but the question there was whether the representatives of a trustee who was not the survivor ought to be parties. [BYRNE, J. referred to McCleane v. Gyles (86 L. T. Rep. 217; (1902) 1 Ch. 911) and Order XVI., r. 11.]

Norton, K.C. and Bailhache for the plaintiff.—We are only asking for a declaration that the defendants are liable to replace this money, so as to prevent them from distributing Jordan's estate without providing for our claim. The representatives of Ludlow have not consented to act as trustees, and there are no trustees of the settlement who can be joined. We are asking for payment of the money into court, and, when that has been done, new trustees can be appointed. It is not necessary to make Ludlow's representatives parties, for it is admitted that, if new trustees were appointed and joined, the action would be properly constituted.

BYRNE, J.—This action is brought by a beneficiary under a settlement dated in 1869, and asks for a declaration that the defendants, who are the executors of a deceased trustee, are liable as such executors to make good a loss which has occurred to the settlement funds. [His Lordship read the claim.] The only parties who are defendants to this action are the representatives of a trustee who was not the last surviving trustee; and therefore there is no one before the court who represents the trust estate, if I may so express it. The person in whom the right to recover moneys belonging to the settlement is, if there be such a person in existence, the representative of the last surviving trustee. Cestuis que trustent can come into court to recover money which was lost, joining the person in whom the right to recover it is legally vested, by reason of the power of the court to execute trusts and to allow beneficiaries to sue in their own names, if a sufficient case be shown. Cases have been cited, of which Re Harrison; Smith v. Allen (ubi sup.) is the chief example, where it was held that, an action having been brought against a surviving executor and trustee, it was not necessary to make the representative of a deceased trustee a party. In that case, in an action for a general account against a surviving executor and trustee, it was held that it was not, in the absence of special circumstances, necessary for the plaintiff to make the representative of a deceased trustee or executor a party. If the defendant required such representative to be added, and the circumstances of the case rendered it advisable that he should be so added, the rules of the Supreme Court 1883 provided by Order XVI., rules 11 and 48, the machinery for that purpose. Chitty, J. gives his reasons for saying the action might be brought in that form, and he says: "Many judgments have been made without any opposition against a surviving executor and trustee, without joining the representatives of others who had died before the action was commenced, where there were no special circumstances in the case rendering it necessary that they should be parties. The order goes in the well-known form." No authority has been produced to me to show that judgment could be given in an action of this kind, which in fact involves something in the nature of a partial execution of the trusts, without having the persons representing the trust estate before the court. It may be that there is no present trustee, as there may be no representative of the last surviving trustee, or, if there be one, that he has refused to accept the trusts of this settlement; but in the present case there is a person entitled to appoint new trustees of the settlement, and if there be no trustees such an appointment ought to be made, and there is no reason why the existing trustees, if any, as such new trustees, should not be brought before the court. It is argued that this action is not asking for execution of the trusts, but is only brought for a declaration that the estate of the deceased trustee is liable for breaches of trust. The plaintiff is not really entitled to be paid any money found due, and it would be difficult to make such an order except in the presence of the parties entitled to be paid, though, of course, in a proper case possibly somebody might be appointed to represent the capital of the trust estate. But it does not rest there. The plaintiff wants an order founded on it—namely, the investment of a sum to answer the loss. The case is of some importance, for there is no authority which covers it, and I do not say that there may not be cases in which the court might entertain such an action as the present, where it was impossible to get representatives before the court; but, where it is possible to do so, some person should be appointed to represent the estate. The case must stand over to enable the present trustees to be joined, or, if there are none, to enable new trustees to be appointed and added as defendants.

Rating — Poor rate — Application for distress warrant — Tender of part of rate — Jurisdiction of justices to issue distress warrant for whole rate — Jurisdiction to issue warrant of commitment for whole rate — Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14), ss. 1, 2.

Where upon a summons for a distress warrant for a poor rate the person liable to pay the same tenders a part of the rate in court before the justices, the justices have, notwithstanding such tender in court, jurisdiction to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate, and, in default of sufficient distress to satisfy the whole amount, to issue a warrant of commitment in respect of the whole amount, notwithstanding a subsequent tender of part.

Rex v. Gillespie and others (ante, p. 15; (1904) 1 K. B. 174) explained.

MOTION for a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of committal whereby the applicant, one Samuel Wiles, was committed to prison for the space of twenty-one days in default of payment of a certain poor rate, and in default of a sufficient distress to satisfy the same; and also for a writ of habeas corpus to bring up the applicant from Wandsworth Prison, where he was imprisoned.

The affidavit of the applicant for the rules—Samuel Wiles, a tailor and outfitter residing at New Malden, Surrey—set out the following facts upon which the application was made:—

A poor rate of 35s. was duly made upon the appellant, and demanded of him. On the ground of religious conviction he refused to pay that part of the poor rate—namely, 5s.—which would be appropriated to sectarian religious instruction under the Education Act 1903. On three distinct occasions he had tendered the whole of the rate, except the 5s., which, as he believed, represented the education rate, and when the demand note was delivered he tendered 30s. (being the whole amount, less the 5s.) to the rate collector in cash, and this tender was refused, and he said that there were more than sufficient goods of his at his house to answer the rate and costs.

On the 22nd Sept. 1903 he appeared before the justices at Kingston-on-Thames to answer a summons for nonpayment of the rate, together with 3s. 6d. for costs. He then told the justices that he was willing to pay the rate, except the 5s., which he declined to pay, as it represented that part of the rate which would be applied to sectarian religious teaching. He had the 30s. in his hand and tendered the same in court, but this tender was refused, and the justices issued a distress warrant for the whole amount and costs.

The warrant officer called several times subsequent to this and asked him to pay the rate. He told the officer that he was willing to pay what he had already offered, and that if the officer was not satisfied with that he must levy for the amount. The officer looked round the premises, and the applicant informed him that he could take certain articles which he pointed out, and which he valued at about 10l.

When the bailiffs went to distrain, the applicant again tendered the 30s., which they refused; and in their return to the distress warrant they reported to the justices that there was no sufficient distress to satisfy the whole amount of the rate and costs.

An application was then made to the justices under the Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14), s. 2, alleging that the applicant had not paid the rate or any part thereof, and had refused so to do, and the justices thereupon made an order of commitment whereby the applicant was to be committed to prison for the space of twenty-one days, unless the above sum and all costs and charges should be sooner paid.

Under this warrant of commitment the applicant was arrested on the 17th Dec. and was conveyed to Wandsworth Prison, and he was still in prison at the date of this application.

There was no question that there was ample distress for the 5s., though there was a question as to whether there was sufficient distress for the whole 35s.

J. A. Compston for the applicant.—The present motion is for a writ of certiorari to test the legality of the action of the justices in issuing a committal warrant by which the applicant was sent to prison for twenty-one days for nonpayment of the poor rate of 35s., he having tendered 30s., part thereof, on several occasions prior to the issue of the committal warrant, including a tender to the justices in court when the distress warrant was issued. The justices had no jurisdiction to issue the distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate. The justices are only empowered to issue a warrant of distress for the full amount if the whole rate is in arrear and is unpaid, and there has been a refusal to pay any part thereof. Here the applicant tendered the greater part of the rate in cash before the justices in court, and it is in evidence that the applicant had sufficient goods on his premises to meet the distress, and unquestionably to meet the distress after taking into account the 30s. tendered. According to the recent decision of this court in Rex v. Gillespie and others (ante, p. 15; (1904) 1 K. B. 174), the justices ought not to have issued a distress warrant for the whole amount of the rate, but ought to have issued it for the balance only. But even if the justices were right in issuing the distress warrant for the full amount, they were not justified in issuing the warrant of commitment for the full amount. The warrant of commitment is therefore bad. The applicant is also entitled to a writ of habeas corpus. If the rules are granted, they ought to be made returnable before the Vacation judge.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. — We are clearly of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. The present application has no doubt arisen from a misunderstanding of the decision of this court in the recent case of Rex v. Gillespie and others (ubi sup.). In that case a part of the rate had been tendered in court before the magistrate, and this court held that the magistrate had a discretion to issue the distress warrant for the balance only, and that where a part of the rate had been tendered before him in court this court could not by mandamus compel him to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount. In this case the magistrates had issued, first, a distress warrant for the full amount and then a commitment order for the full amount, and in so doing they had acted within their jurisdiction and within their rights. We are now asked to say that, because the applicant had tendered part of the rate in court before the magistrates, the magistrates had no jurisdiction to issue a warrant for the full amount. We think that is not so, and that the magistrates had jurisdiction to issue the distress warrant for the whole amount. We are of opinion that the magistrates had jurisdiction to do what they did, and that there should be no rule.

KNUCKEY v. REDRUTH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

Mine—Owner—Duty to fence—Public well in shaft of abandoned mine—Vesting of well in local authority—Liability of local authority to fence—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 64—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), ss. 13, 41.

Where the shaft of an abandoned mine contains water and is used by the inhabitants of the district as a well and as being a public well becomes vested in the local authority under sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875, the local authority are not the "owners" of the mine, or the persons "interested in minerals of the mine," within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, and are not bound under that section to fence the shaft, and consequently, in the absence of negligence on their part, they are not liable for injuries caused by the shaft not having been fenced.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the County Court of Cornwall, held at Redruth.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, who was a farmer near Redruth, to recover 33l. for the loss of his horse, which had strayed and fallen into a well which, as the plaintiff alleged, the defendants, as the local authority, were under a statutory obligation to fence.

The well was the shaft of an old disused mine, and was in depth some 36ft. to the top of the water and about 5ft. of water. It was situate in a field on another farm and was a public well, the evidence showing that the people of the district all got water from it, though they had to open and pass through a gate belonging to the plaintiff to get to the well. Each person provided his own rope for raising the water.

The well was unfenced, and the plaintiff's horse strayed and fell into it, and it appeared that in the year 1887 a dog fell into it, and that the sanitary inspector of the local authority attended to the matter by having the dog removed from the well, and by having notices printed and distributed that a decomposed dog had been found there, and that the water was not fit to be drunk, and it appeared that the horse was taken out of the well by the sanitary inspector.

For the defendants it was contended before the County Court judge that there was no duty on the defendants to fence the shaft; that the horse was trespassing and so fell into the well, and that all the things the council had done they were entitled to do under sects. 3 and 7 of the Public Health (Water) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 25).

For the plaintiff it was contended (1) that the well became vested in the defendants' predecessors by virtue of sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875; (2) that it was an old pit shaft; and (3) that the defendants were bound to fence it under sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), as being the owners of the mine or persons interested in the minerals of the mine, within the meaning of that section: (Evans v. Mostyn, 36 L. T. Rep. 856; 2 C. P. Div. 547).

The learned County Court judge held that the well became vested in the defendant council or their predecessors by virtue of sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875; that it was an old pit shaft; and that the defendant council were not, by the vesting of the well, owners or persons interested in the minerals, so as to compel them to fence it under sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 64. All existing public cisterns, pumps, wells, reservoirs, conduits, aqueducts, and works used for the gratuitous supply of water to the inhabitants of the district of any local authority, shall vest in and be under the control of such authority, and such authority may cause the same to be maintained and plentifully supplied with pure and wholesome water or may substitute, maintain, and plentifully supply with pure and wholesome water other such works equally convenient; they may also (subject to the provisions of this Act) construct any other such works for supplying water for the gratuitous use of any inhabitants who choose to carry the same away, not for sale, but for their own private use.

The Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77) provides:

Sect. 13. Where any mine to which this Act applies is abandoned or the working thereof discontinued, at whatever time such abandonment or discontinuance occurred, the owner thereof, and every other person interested in the minerals of the mine, shall cause the top of the shaft and any side entrance from the surface to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents. Provided that—(1) Subject to any contract to the contrary, the owner of the mine shall, as between him and any other person interested in the minerals of the mine, be liable to carry into effect this section, and to pay any costs incurred by any other person interested in the minerals of the mine in carrying this section into effect.

(3) Nothing in this section shall exempt any person from any liability under any other Act or otherwise. If any person fail to act in conformity with this section he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act. Any shaft or side entrance which is not fenced as required by this section, and is within fifty yards of any highway, road, footpath, or place of public resort, or is in open or uninclosed land, or is required by an inspector as aforesaid to be fenced, shall be deemed to be a nuisance within the meaning of section eight of the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855 as amended and extended by the Sanitary Act 1866.

Sect. 41. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires: The term "mine" includes every shaft in the course of being sunk, and every level and inclined plane in the course of being driven for commencing or opening any mine, or for searching for or proving minerals, and all the shafts, levels, planes, works, machinery, tramways, and sidings, both below ground and above ground in and adjacent to a mine, and any such shaft, level, and inclined plane, and belonging to the mine. The term "shaft" includes pit. The term "owner" when used in relation to any mine means any person or body corporate who is the immediate proprietor, or lessee, or occupier of any mine, or of any part thereof, and does not include a person or body corporate who merely receives a royalty, rent, or fine from a mine, or is merely the proprietor of a mine subject to any lease, grant, or licence for the working thereof, or is merely the owner of the soil and not interested in the minerals of the mines.

Bethune (R. C. Glen with him) for the plaintiff.—The question turns upon sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875 and sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872. Under sect. 64 of the Act of 1875 the well became vested in the local authority, and the judge has found that it was so vested in the defendant council. The definition of "owner" is given in sect. 41 of the Act of 1872, and the judge has held that the defendant council did not become the "owners" within the meaning of that section. The definition of "mine" is given in sect. 41, and it shows that you can have an abandoned mine in which there are no minerals. The well vested in the defendants under sect. 64, and they were owners of it; it was a mine within the meaning of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, and it was an abandoned or discontinued mine, and therefore it came within the terms of sect. 13 of that Act. The defendants are therefore liable under sect. 13 to fence it, and, as they did not do so, they are liable in damages to the plaintiff for the loss of his horse. Anyone who comes within the definition of "owner" in sect. 41 is liable, although there may be many owners. If this well had been closed, the defendants, as the local authority, would have had a right to get it opened. If the well was vested in the defendants under sect. 64 they were liable, under sect. 13 of the Act of 1872, to fence it, as being the owners of it:

Evans v. Mostyn, 36 L. T. Rep. 856; 2 C. P. Div. 547.

In Dublin United Tramways Company v. Fitzgerald (87 L. T. Rep. 532; (1903) A. C. 99) it was held that a tramway company, in whom the roadway between the rails of their line had vested under the Tramways Act 1870, were liable in damages to a person who had sustained injuries by reason of such roadway being out of repair; and upon the same principle, where a well is vested in a public authority by virtue of a statute, they ought to be equally liable for injury caused by their not fencing the well. [He also referred to Coverdale v. Charlton (40 L. T. Rep. 88; 4 Q. B. Div. 104) as to the vesting of the well in the defendants; and Kennedy, J. referred to Foster v. Owen (67 L. T. Rep. 712).]

Schiller for the defendants (the local authority).

—The learned judge was right in holding that there was no obligation upon the defendants under sect. 13 to fence the well. I assume that this was a public well, and that under sect. 64 it vested in the defendants as the local authority, yet even then sect. 13 does not impose any obligation upon the local authority to fence it. Sect. 13 points to a different state of circumstances altogether. If the contention for the plaintiff is right, then, if a person sank a shaft and water sprang up in it, the local authority would be the persons who would be entitled to get the minerals; but it would be a strong proposition to say that the owner who had sunk the shaft should not get the minerals through that shaft. When the words of sect. 13 are looked at, it is clear that the word "owner" means the person who has the right to get the minerals out of the mine. Sects. 13 and 41 contemplate two different sets of circumstances with regard to the word "owner." [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If the well is vested in the defendants as owners, why may they not be bound to fence it, apart altogether from this section?] They would not be so bound to fence it, because they would have no right to go on the land except under and by virtue of this section. Even under sect. 64 the local authority are not bound to maintain the well; their duties in that respect are wholly discretionary, indicated by the word "may." Although for the general purposes of the Act the word "owner" is defined widely in sect. 41, yet, when we come to sect. 13, only those who are entitled to or interested in the minerals in the mine are deemed to be owners; and under that section it is only those who have got the beneficial interest in the minerals of the mine who, as owners, are to fence off the mine. There was really no evidence on which the judge could find that this was a public well. [He was stopped upon the question as to sect. 13.]

Bethune, in reply, referred to the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird (74 L. T. Rep., at p. 388; (1896) A. C., at p. 442).

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case the learned County Court judge has found that the well was a public well and became vested in the defendants by virtue of sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875. I have no doubt there was evidence on which he might come to that finding. That being so, of course we do not sit in review upon his judgment with regard to that matter. But it seems to me that that is by no means conclusive of the case, and in fact goes a very little way to decide it. I agree that the vesting of the well under sect. 64 of the Public Health Act will, according to ordinary principles applicable to such vestings under such Acts in public bodies, vest in the public authority certain rights of property in the well and in so much of the land as is necessary for them to perform their duties. I have very little doubt that the public authority, in taking steps to prevent nuisances, will have the right, and very likely the duty, to protect the well from danger, if in order to discharge their duty and make the well properly efficient for its purpose they might think it right so to do. That, however, is not the question we have to decide in this case. It is not alleged against the defendants that because they were the owners of the well they kept the well in a dangerous condition whereby the horse fell into the well. It is not alleged that they had a nuisance near a highway or anything of that kind, and counsel for the plaintiff very frankly said at the opening of his argument that he had no case except that based on sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872. Therefore we have not got to consider what might be the liability of the defendants if this were the ordinary case of nuisance and, the well being vested in the district council, we had to consider whether the local authority had been guilty of a breach of a statutory obligation imposed upon somebody by sect. 13. Sect. 13 says: "Where any mine to which this Act applies is abandoned the owner thereof and every other person interested in the minerals of the mine shall cause the top of the shaft to be securely fenced." If those words stood there by themselves without the interpretation clause, I think it could scarcely be disputed that "thereof" there means "of the mine," and that meaning is accentuated by the provision extending not only to the owner of the mine, but to "every other person interested in the minerals of the mine." Therefore the duty of seeing to the fencing is put upon persons who are either owners of the mine or are connected with the mine—that is to say, with the minerals underground. Then came sect. 41, which extends "mine" so as to include all the shafts both below ground and above ground in or adjacent to the mine. Therefore I agree that the same person who owns the mine also owns the shafts, and it is the owner of the shafts in connection with that mine who is under the obligation imposed by sect. 13. Lastly, it seems to me that the section was pointing to the owner of the mine and the minerals or the persons interested in the minerals of the mine, as distinguished from the mere owners of the soil for other purposes, and that the exclusion from the word "owner" of certain persons is made abundantly plain. The term "owner" is defined, and "owner" when used in relation to any mine shall include bodies corporate, immediate proprietor, or lessee or occupier of any mine, but does not include a person who is merely the owner of the soil and who is not interested in the minerals of the mines. That being so, it seems to me that whether we look at sect. 13 by itself, or whether we read it with sect. 41, the word "owner" does not mean or refer to the mere legal ownership of the soil which surrounds the shaft, but it does refer to the person who is either owner of the mines, or is so interested in the minerals of the mines as to come within the language of sect. 13. That being the case, what is the position of these defendants? They have the well. It is on private property to a certain extent, and it is approached, we are told, by a lane which is not a public highway. I think, considering the language of that section and sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875, it would seem to indicate that the County Court judge might come to the conclusion, to which he has come in this case, that the well was, for the purposes of sect. 64 of the Act of 1875, vested in the defendants. Therefore that is why I commenced my judgment by saying that I accept that position for the purposes of this case. In my opinion the defendant council were not owners of the mine or the shaft within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Act of 1872. They were certainly not persons interested in the minerals, and therefore the County Court judge was right in saying that the action against them is founded solely upon sect. 13, and there being, apart from the statute, no case against them of negligence in keeping their well, I think the learned judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the keynote of sect. 13 is that the liability is cast upon either the owner, or the person having an interest akin to ownership in the minerals of the mine, and nobody else. I think that that is accentuated by the consideration of the definition of "owner" in sect. 41, which for certain purposes excludes persons who are not interested in the minerals of the mines. Therefore I think there is no pretence for saying that the defendants in this case, the local authority, are at all interested in the minerals of the mine, whatever that may mean, which either was an abandoned mine, or which then was said to have been an abandoned mine, but which had once been a mine containing minerals. I think, therefore, that the defendants are not liable, and the only case which was made against them, as I understand, at the trial was that they were liable by virtue of sect. 64 of the Public Health Act 1875 and sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that when we consider this question it is impossible to say that the public body, in whom, under sect. 64, the well became vested and to whom control of the well passed, are the owners merely by virtue of that statutory provision in sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal refused.

TOWER DIVISION LICENSING JUSTICES (apps.) v. CHAMBERS AND OTHERS (resps.). (a)

Licensing—Beerhouse licensed before 1869—Conviction of licence-holder for selling spirits—Disqualification of licence-holder—Application by owner to special sessions for licence—Discretion of justices—Limitation to the four specified grounds—Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19—Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 15.

The holder of the licence of a beerhouse which had been licensed for the sale of beer and wine to be consumed on or off the premises, prior to and continuously since the 1st May 1869, was for the first time convicted of the offence of selling spirits without a licence, and the beerhouse was thereupon closed. At the next special sessions the owner of the beerhouse applied under sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1874 for the grant of a licence for the sale of beer and wine by retail in respect of the premises to a person who was then the resident occupier of the premises. The licence was refused by the special sessions upon grounds other than one of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.

Held, upon the authority of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (81 L. T. Rep. 221; (1899) 2 Q. B. 607)—the distinction between the application, as in that case, to a court of summary jurisdiction for an authority to carry on the business in the meantime, and the application to the special sessions for the grant of a licence, being for this purpose immaterial—that sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 applied, and that consequently the special sessions had not a general discretion to refuse the licence, but could only refuse the same upon one or other of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of that Act.

CASE stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of London, upon an appeal heard and determined at the general quarter sessions of the peace held at Clerkenwell for the county, on the 16th Oct. 1903, against the refusal of the appellants (the licensing justices for the Tower division) to grant to the respondent Coburn a certificate authorising the grant to him of a licence to sell by retail beer and wine to be consumed on or off the premises, at a house known as the Coach and Horses, situate in the parish of St. George-in-the-East, in the Tower division.

The appeal was allowed by the quarter sessions subject to this case.

The Coach and Horses beerhouse was licensed for the sale of beer and wine to be consumed on or off the premises prior to the 1st May 1869, and the licence had been renewed from time to time, the last renewal thereof having been made to one Joseph Arch, the then tenant, at the general annual licensing meeting of the division on the 13th Feb. 1903.

In the month of July 1903 proceedings were instituted by the Excise authorities against Joseph Arch, under the Beerhouse Act 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85), s. 20, to recover penalties under the Excise Licences Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), and Joseph Arch was on the 30th July 1903 for the first time convicted of the offence of selling spirits without a licence, a copy of the conviction being annexed to this case.

The beerhouse was thereupon closed for the sale of beer and wine, and was not again opened for such sale until after the hearing of the above-mentioned appeal on the 16th Oct.

On the 18th Sept. 1903 an application was made to a metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at the Thames Police-court, on behalf of the respondents Chambers, Sichel, and Coombes (trading as Chambers Brothers and Co.), who were the owners of the beerhouse, pursuant to sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1874, for authority to the respondent Coburn to carry on the same business upon the same premises until the then next special sessions for licensing purposes. This application was, at the suggestion of the magistrate, treated as withdrawn.

On the 28th Sept. 1903 (being the then next special sessions of the Tower division for licensing purposes) a further application was made on behalf of the owners to such special sessions for the grant of a licence for the sale of beer and wine by retail in respect of such premises to the respondent Coburn, pursuant to sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1874. The respondent Coburn was then the real resident holder and occupier of the beerhouse. The grant of such licence was refused at the special sessions upon grounds other than one or more of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27). There was no evidence before the licensing justices which would bring the case within any one of those four grounds.

Against this refusal the respondents duly appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions, when it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the licensing justices had jurisdiction to refuse the grant of the licence to the respondent Coburn upon grounds other than one or more of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, and on behalf of the respondents it was contended that the jurisdiction of the licensing justices to refuse the grant was limited to one or more of the four grounds.

The Court of Quarter Sessions found for the respondents, and allowed the appeal.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts above stated the licensing justices for the Tower division aforesaid had jurisdiction to refuse the grant to the respondent Coburn upon any ground other than one or more of the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.

If the court should answer the question in the negative, the order of the sessions was to stand; but otherwise the order of sessions was to be quashed and the appeal sent back to the Court of Quarter Sessions to be heard on the merits, or such other order was to be made as to the court seemed just.

The Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49) provides:

Sect. 15. Where any licensed person is convicted for the first time of any one of the following offences . . . (3) Selling spirits without a spirit licence . . . and in consequence either becomes personally disqualified or has his licence forfeited, there may be made by or on behalf of the owner of the premises an application to a court of summary jurisdiction for authority to carry on the same business on the same premises until the next special sessions for licensing purposes, and a further application to such next special sessions for the grant of a licence in respect of such premises, and for this purpose the provisions contained in the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Act 1828 with respect to the grant of a temporary authority and to the grant of licences at special sessions shall apply as if the person convicted had been rendered incapable of keeping an inn, and the person applying for such grant was his assignee.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27) provides:

Sect. 19. Where, on the first of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, a licence under any of the said recited Acts is in force with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises, may be refused in accordance with this Act.

Sect. 19 was amended by sect. 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29) as follows:

Sect. 7. The nineteenth section of the principal Act [that is, of the Act of 1869] shall extend to licences granted by way of renewal from time to time of licences in force on the 1st day of May 1869, whether such licences continue to be held by the same person or have been or may be transferred to any other person or persons.

The four grounds upon which the justices can act in refusing the renewal are specified in sect. 8 of the Act of 1869, and the grounds upon which the grant of the licence was refused in the present case were not one or other of those four grounds.

Macmorran, K.C. (R. D. Muir and W. H. Leicester with him) for the appellant justices.—The real question is whether the conviction of Arch did away with the licence. If it did, then the licensing justices in special sessions had general jurisdiction to refuse the grant of the licence upon the usual grounds and were not limited to the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869. Upon the conviction of Arch the licence became void. In Reg v. West Riding Justices (21 Q. B. Div. 258), where a licence existing on the 1st May 1869 for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises was forfeited by a conviction under sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1872, for permitting the premises to be used as a brothel, it was held that the licence was no longer "in force" within sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, and that the licensing justices in special sessions had a general discretion to refuse the application of the owner for a grant of the licence, and that they were not limited to the four grounds. So in Traynor v. Jones (69 L. T. Rep. 862; (1894) 1 Q. B. 83), where the beerhouse was about to be pulled down for a public purpose, and the holder of the licence applied to the special sessions for the grant of a corresponding licence to sell beer at another house, it was held that the justices were not limited to the four grounds, but had a general discretion to refuse the application. In Freer v. Murray (71 L. T. Rep. 444; (1894) A. C. 576), it was held by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, that where a beer licence which had been held continuously since 1869 had expired, the tenant's application for a renewal having been refused, and where a new tenant subsequently applied under sect. 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, to the special sessions for a transfer of the licence, under sect. 19 of the Act of 1869 the justices were not limited to the four grounds of refusal, but had a general discretion. In the two cases of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (81 L. T. Rep. 27, 221; (1899) 2 Q. B. 154, 607), the justices did not appear, so that the question was not argued from the point of view of the justices, and the case of Reg.

v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) was not cited to the court. There is also the distinction between the second of those two cases and the present case that in that case the application was to a magistrate for a temporary authority, whereas, in this case the application was one to the special sessions for a grant of the licence. Further, the decision in Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) was inconsistent with the decision in Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.), and the latter case ought now to be followed. Sect. 15 no doubt gives the owner the right to apply, but it leaves the discretion of the justices unfettered.

Footle, K.C. (Bruce Williamson with him) for the respondents.—The decision of quarter sessions was right. Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (81 L. T. Rep. 221; (1899) 2 Q. B. 607), is a clear authority in favour of the respondents and ought to be followed. The cases of Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) and Freer v. Murray (ubi sup.) are distinguishable. In Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) the licence-holder was convicted under sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1872 for permitting his premises to be used as a brothel, and by that section itself if the licensed person is convicted of that offence, he "shall forfeit his licence"; so that the licence in that case was absolutely forfeited and had expired, and the forfeiture of the licence upon that conviction destroyed the privilege and reduced the premises to the condition of unlicensed premises. That case is distinguishable in this, that the conviction was not for one of the four offences specified in sect. 15 of the Act of 1874, but was under a different section altogether, which did not give the owner a special right to apply, as the section applicable in the present case does. So in Freer v. Murray (ubi sup.) the licence had expired, and, as stated by Lord Herschell, L.C., it was not in a state of suspended animation, but was dead, and all that could be granted was a new licence, not one technically so called, but a transfer within the language of the Licensing Acts, nevertheless not a licence which revived the old licence. In that case, therefore, the licence had expired when application was made to the special sessions, and as the licence had not continued in existence down to the date of the application, it was held that the statutory limitation imposed upon the discretion of the justices by sect. 19 of the Act of 1869 had no application as the licence was not "in force," and that therefore the special sessions were not limited to the four grounds, but had a general jurisdiction. In the present case the respondents applied to the special sessions under sect. 15 of the Act of 1874 for the grant of a licence. The section itself gave the owner the right to apply, so that the principle of Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) and Freer v. Murray (ubi sup.) does not apply to this case. The case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) covers this case. The cases are identical, with this slight distinction, which does not affect the principle—namely, that in Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) the application was to a magistrate for authority to carry on the business until the next special sessions, whereas in the present case the application was to the special sessions for the grant of the licence, the application which was made to the magistrate having been withdrawn as the special sessions were so near at hand. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We are inclined to think that your contention is right, that Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) and Freer v. Murray (ubi sup.) are not authorities against you, and that Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) is an authority in your favour, and we are also inclined to think that the special sessions had power to deal with the application, although no authority had been obtained from a magistrate in the meantime to carry on the business.] [He did not further argue.]

Macmorran, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—As this case has not been fully argued on the part of the respondents, and as I think that we are bound by the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), and that the principle of that case is an authority in favour of the respondents, I do not propose to discuss the matter at any length. I only wish to make some observations to indicate why I think we are bound by that case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.). The present case illustrates the difficulty the courts have in construing and applying the licensing laws. On the other hand, one must not forget that this is a very thorny subject, and an extremely difficult one for the Legislature to deal with, and therefore while we have to discharge our duty in construing them we cannot, and ought not, to blame anybody for the way in which these Acts are drawn. In my opinion it is quite plain that from one point of view the argument of counsel for the appellants may be said to go a little too far, because I think he does not give sufficient effect to the consequences of allowing a person to apply after a conviction. It is quite plain that if the conviction has forfeited the licence there must in that case be a break, and therefore it would seem to me that the section—sect. 15—contemplates, under some circumstances, a state of things in which the principle of the case of Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) could not apply, because there must be a suspension of the licence in cases in which the licence has been absolutely forfeited. But in this case counsel for the appellants says with regard to that that the section gives the right to apply, but leaves unfettered the discretion of the court—whether the magistrate or the special sessions—to whom the application is made, as to the grounds upon which they will refuse or continue the grant of the licence. On the other hand, it is said that the effect of allowing the owner to apply in such a case in respect of an old beerhouse is to give him the privileges which the person applying for a transfer under sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act of 1869 would have through the tribunal being limited to the four grounds specified in sect. 8 of that Act. That being the question to be dealt with, I think we could not accede to the argument of counsel for the appellants without overruling, at any rate, the principle, and as I think myself the authority, of the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.). It may be for the reasons that have been mentioned by my brother Kennedy amongst others that the case of Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.) can be distinguished as dealing with a different section; but I must say that in any case, in my opinion, Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) is so much an authority that we really could not deal with the present case contrary to the principle of that case without practically overruling it, and of course we do not do that in a case where there is an appeal. I prefer to say that I think we are bound by the principle of the decision in Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), and therefore we must affirm the decision of the quarter sessions. It is a case, as it seems to me, of sufficient importance to be, and obviously ought to be, further discussed, and if there is to be an appeal in this case this is the ground upon which we put our decision, that we are bound by the decision in that case and that we do not overrule the decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. I should like to say that if this case goes further, I think the first case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (81 L. T. Rep. 27; (1899) 2 Q. B. 154), which has some little bearing on this question, may require to be further considered as to whether these words “for the first time” do cover the whole section or the first part of the section only.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think in respect to the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) we are bound by it, and that it is so exactly in point in all its circumstances that it really must be followed in the present case. The only distinction between that case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) and this case, that I can see, is that in that case the application was an application in the first instance to a court of summary jurisdiction, whereas this is an application to the special sessions. I cannot for myself think that the Act of Parliament meant to make any distinction whatever between the rights of the parties on those two occasions, and therefore it seems to me that Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) is really exactly in point, and must be followed. I must say, speaking for myself, that the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) is very difficult to reconcile with the case of Reg. v. West Riding Justices (ubi sup.). I have appreciated what counsel for the respondents has said about it, but, after all is said, it seems to me that in the one case the court held that, under circumstances which are very closely analogous to the circumstances in the present case, the expression “in force” in sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 was not satisfied, and that in Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.) they held that it was satisfied. It seems to me, therefore, extremely difficult to reconcile those two decisions. I merely say that, after having spent a couple of hours in going through these sections besides listening to the arguments in this case, it seems to me to be a matter of extreme difficulty and perplexity, and I am glad to take refuge in the fact that I am bound by the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.).

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I in no way differ from anything that my Lord has said. But after what has been said by the other members of the court, I think it right to point out that, while saying that we are bound by the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), I see no reason to intimate that I feel any reason to dissent from it. Although there may be no difference between that case and the present case—and I do not think that in substance there is any difference—it seems to me that this is merely carrying out what the Act of Parliament, to my mind, authorised when these Acts are read together—namely, that in a case of this kind up to the time of the next special sessions the licence may be treated as alive, and there is a power given by the section to allow the owner to carry on the business in the meantime, and it was upon an application of that kind by the owner in the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), that the matter arose. I think there is no essential difference between the application in that case and the application in this case. The question which there arose was a question which to my mind was rather more difficult, if I may say so, than the question which arises in this case. The time for applying in a case of this kind appears to me to be at the special sessions, at which the application in this case was made and refused, that decision being reversed by the Court of Quarter Sessions. In the case of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), it seems to me that a more difficult question arose, because the application there was an application to the magistrate in the meantime by the owner to carry on the business. Whether that is granted or refused there is a licence to be dealt with, and on the principle of Ex parte Flinn and Sons (No. 2) (ubi sup.), to be dealt with as the Court of Quarter Sessions have held in the decision which we have now affirmed.

WARD v. HADDRILL. (a)

County Court — Cross-judgments — Separate actions—Payment of judgment debt into court—Right to set off smaller judgment debt—Solicitor's lien for costs—Right to enforce lien against whole sum in court—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 150.

By sect. 150 of the County Courts Act 1888 it is provided: "If there shall be cross-judgments between the parties, execution shall be taken out by that party only who shall have obtained judgment for the larger sum, and for so much only as shall remain after deducting the smaller sum, and satisfaction for the remainder shall be entered, as well as satisfaction on the judgment for the smaller sum; and if both sums shall be equal, satisfaction shall be entered upon both judgments."

Held, that this section applies where cross-judgments are obtained by the parties in separate actions, and not merely where the cross-judgment are obtained in a claim and counter-claim in the same action; and also where the party against whom judgment has been obtained for the larger sum has paid that sum into court without waiting for execution to be taken out, but the party against whom judgment has been obtained for the smaller sum has not paid that sum into court; and that before the party in whose favour the larger sum has been paid into court can have that sum paid out to him, the other party is entitled to have deducted from it the smaller sum for which he has obtained judgment, although that sum has not been paid into court, notwithstanding that the solicitor of the party in whose favour the judgment for the larger sum has been obtained has a lien for his costs upon the whole sum in court, as in such case the solicitor's lien for his costs extends not to the whole sum in court, but to the balance only.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the decision of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court.

The plaintiff had brought two actions in the County Court against the defendant. In the first of these actions judgment was given for the plaintiff against the defendant for 21*l.*, and in the second action judgment was given for the defendant with costs, which were taxed at 5*l.* The defendant had paid into court in the first action the 21*l.* which the plaintiff had recovered against him in that action, and before the defendant had so paid the 21*l.* into court he applied to the judge that the money should not be paid out to the plaintiff pending a motion he was about to make as to the payment out of that sum of his costs in the second action—namely, the 5*l.* The plaintiff did not pay into court the amount of the defendant's taxed costs (the 5*l.*) in the second action.

The defendant then applied to the County Court judge for an order that the sum of 21*l.* paid into court in the first action by the defendant should not be paid out of court to the plaintiff or her solicitor, unless and until the plaintiff had paid into court the sum of 5*l.*, being the defendant's taxed costs in the second action; or, in the alternative, for an order that there should be paid out of the sum of 21*l.* in court, to the defendant or his solicitors, the sum of 5*l.* in respect of those taxed costs, and he relied on sect. 150 of the County Courts Act 1888.

Objection was taken on behalf of the plaintiff that her solicitor had a lien for his costs upon the 21*l.* in court; that those costs amounted to more than the sum in court, and that therefore the judge had no power to order that any less sum than the whole amount in court should be paid out of court to the plaintiff or her solicitor.

The County Court judge made the order as applied for by the defendant, whereby he ordered that the amount (21*l.*) paid into court as due from the defendant to the plaintiff under the judgment in the first action should be subject to a set-off for the 5*l.* due to the defendant under the judgment in the second action; that the balance only should be paid out to the plaintiff, and that 5*l.* should be paid out of the 21*l.* in court to the plaintiff.

From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Douglas Hogg (H. Dobb with him) for the appellant.—The County Court judge was wrong in making the order; he had no jurisdiction to make such an order. The 21*l.* paid into court by the defendant in the first action was subject to the lien of the plaintiff's solicitor for costs which exceeded that amount. It is said that under sects. 113 and 150 of the County Courts Act 1888 the judge had power to make the order, but those sections have not that effect. Sect. 113 only gives the judge a discretion to deal with costs "not herein otherwise provided for"—that is, not otherwise provided for in the Act. That provision cannot refer to, and does not affect, a solicitor's lien for his costs on money which is in court. So, sect. 150 does not justify the order which has been made. The section provides that where there are cross-judgments between the parties, execution shall only issue for the balance of the larger over the smaller sum. That must be read as being subject to the solicitor's lien for costs; and to take that lien away there must be express words in the section to that effect, but there are no express words taking away the right of the solicitor to a lien for his costs on the sum in court. Again, sect. 150 does not apply here, as it is limited to the issue of execution, and does not apply where the money has been paid into court, and where consequently no execution can be taken out. So, the section does not apply to cross-judgments in two different actions; it only applies in the case of cross-judgments in a claim and counter-claim in the same action.

Thorn Drury for the respondent.—The learned judge had jurisdiction to make the order, and was right in making it. Sect. 150 clearly gives him power to make the order. It says that where there are cross-judgments between the parties for different amounts, execution shall only be issued for the balance. The smaller sum for which judgment has been given has to be deducted from the larger sum, and the balance only is payable to the party who has obtained the judgment for the larger sum. It is to this balance only that the solicitor's lien extends; it does not extend to the whole sum. The intention of this enactment clearly was that the person who had got a judgment for the smaller sum should not be compelled to wait until the other party who had judgment for the larger sum issued execution for the larger sum before he got the benefit given by the section. It was clearly intended that he should have the right of set-off after the judgments were given. The defendant has not lost his right by paying the 21*l.* into court. He cannot be in a worse position by having paid the money into court than if he had waited for execution to be issued by the plaintiff, thereby incurring more costs. Therefore the fact that the defendant had paid the 21*l.* into court, instead of waiting for execution, does not deprive him of the right which he would have had if he had waited for execution, of setting off the 5*l.* Lastly, it is said that the section only applies to cross-judgments in a claim and counter-claim in the same action. That cannot be so, as there is the same provision in sect. 93 of the first County Courts Act, the County Courts Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), when counter-claims were not known.

Douglas Hogg in reply.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. The point raised is a short one, and it has been well argued on each side. I do not hesitate to say that the effect of what the Legislature has done in this statute is to establish for County Courts a different system with regard to a solicitor's lien for costs from that which prevails in the High Court. If that is the case, then it can only be because this Act provides that it should be the case. If the Act says so, then the Act must be followed. Sect. 150 says in very clear terms that where there are cross-judgments between the parties in the County Court, if the party who has got judgment for the smaller sum chooses to wait for execution, thereby, no doubt, incurring further costs, he can set off the smaller sum for which he has got judgment against the larger sum for which the other party has obtained judgment against him. If that right to set off the smaller sum against the larger sum exists, then it is quite clear that the only sum for which execution can issue is the balance, because the section says that not only shall the execution be "for so much only as shall remain after deducting the smaller sum," but also that "satisfaction for the remainder shall be entered, as well as satisfaction on the judgment for the smaller sum," and if both sums are equal, then "satisfaction shall be entered upon both judgments." Having regard to those provisions, how can it be said that the solicitor's lien for costs is preserved? Then the question arises: Are we to look at the substance of what the Legislature intended in this section—namely, that there should be no enforceable judgment except for the balance against the person who has recovered the smaller sum—or are we to look only at the words which deal with execution, and to say that, if the person who has obtained judgment for the smaller sum, but against whom judgment has been obtained for the larger sum, pays into court the larger sum for which judgment has been obtained against him, he has lost his right to set off the smaller sum against the larger? I cannot think that the Legislature could have intended that before the person who has paid the larger sum into court can get the benefit of this enactment he must incur considerably more costs in respect of having execution issued against him than he has already incurred. If he cannot have an enforceable judgment for the smaller sum which has been given in his favour, I do not think that the statute ever intended that he should have an enforceable judgment against him except for the balance between that smaller sum and the larger sum he has paid into court. I therefore think that the judgment of the County Court judge was right. Although sect. 150 of the Act may not in precise terms cover this case, still I think its meaning clearly is that there shall be no available process except for the balance between the larger and smaller sum. It was said during the argument that if that were the true construction to be put upon the section, it must be so per incuriam. I can hardly think that that is so, as we find the same provision contained in the first County Courts Act of 1846, under which County Courts were created. That was an Act very carefully drawn and considered, and at the time it was passed the jurisdiction of the County Courts was much more limited than it is now. It was passed for the purpose of securing a cheap and speedy administration of the law for the benefit of the poorer classes, and was frequently called "the poor man's court." It may be that the Legislature intended to prevent the multiplication of costs, even though they might be properly incurred. However that may be, when we bear in mind the fact that the provisions in sect. 150 of the Act of 1888 were contained in the Act of 1846, when there was no right of counter-claim, it seems to me abundantly clear that "cross-judgments" in sect. 150 must mean cross-judgments in different actions, and not merely cross-judgments where there is a claim and counter-claim in the same action.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 150 would clearly have applied if the defendant, instead of paying the 21l. into court, had waited until execution were issued, in which case the 5l., for which the defendant got judgment, would have had to be deducted, and the balance only would have been paid over to the plaintiff. I entirely concur in what has been said by my brother Wills as to the effect of sect. 150, and it seems to me that the object of that section would be entirely defeated if we were to give to that section the effect which has been contended for by the appellant. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

HOOPER v. BROMET; RAPHAEL (Third Party). (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Restrictive covenants—Loss of deeds—Defective copy—Indemnity—Deed found—Breach of covenant contained in lost deed—Action—Costs—Liability under indemnity—Natural and proximate result of difference in deeds.

Certain lands were subject to a building scheme, the provisions of which were contained in a deed of 1854. The purchaser of a plot was informed by the vendor in good faith that the original deed was lost or destroyed, and what purported to be a true copy was produced. This copy subsequently proved to be defective. An action was brought by an adjoining owner to restrain the purchaser from erecting or allowing to remain upon his land certain buildings which contravened the provision as to a building line in the deed of 1854. The property in respect of which he was entitled to sue had certain erections upon it contravening another building stipulation, which provided that no erection should be built within 4ft. of a boundary fence.

At the trial of the action it was held that the defendant was affected with notice of the building stipulations, and that the plaintiff had only committed a trivial breach of a trivial covenant, and that such a breach did not disentitle the plaintiff from having the building stipulations strictly enforced, and judgment was given for the plaintiff with costs, the defendant being directed to remove certain buildings erected by him on the land.

The third party to the action had sold the property to the defendant, and upon such sale had written a letter agreeing to indemnify the defendant, as purchaser, against all "costs, damages, and expenses" which the defendant might suffer or incur "by reason of the building stipulations and conditions being other than those set out in the copy."

Held, that the third party was liable to pay the defendant the difference in the value of the plot in consequence of the amount of land available for building under the provisions of the deed of 1854 being less than under the supposed copy; and also of the defence that the plaintiff was disentitled to sue in consequence of his having broken one of the covenants.

Held, also, that the defendant, having had actual notice of the provisions of the deed of 1854 before he commenced to build, the third party was not liable for the cost of building or removing the buildings.

Held, also, that the defendant was not entitled to recover from the third party the costs of the plaintiff incurred in the action and paid by the defendant, or the defendant's own costs so far as they related to the following defences set up by the defendant—viz., a denial that the provisions of the deed of 1854 applied to the plot purchased by him or that he had notice of such provisions; that the liquidator of the company formerly owning the land to which the deed of 1854 applied, had, under a power given by that deed to the "vendors, their heirs or assigns," by an agreement in writing, approved of by the court, released or waived the covenant which it was alleged had been broken; that no building scheme was contained in the deed of 1854, and if there was it had come to an end by mutual consent of the various purchasers of the land comprised in it.

Decision of Farwell, J. (89 L. T. Rep. 37) varied as to the costs payable by the third party under the indemnity.

THE plaintiff and defendant were owners of adjoining houses upon a building estate at St. Margarets-on-Thames, Middlesex.

The estate belonged originally to the Conservative Building Society, and in 1854 was vested in two trustees of the society.

The provisions as to the class of house to be erected, the building lines to be followed, and other matters were embodied in a deed of covenant of the 31st Aug. 1854.

The deed was entered into between the trustees of the society and various purchasers of plots, and in the schedule the terms and conditions with respect to building and otherwise were set forth by reference to an accompanying plan.

So far as material, they were as follows:

4. Building Lines—The purchasers of the lot coloured blue are to erect the external face of the front walls of all buildings on all plots and flank walls of buildings on the corner plots agreeably to the front or flank building line shown.

5. Spaces for Building.—The space between the front and back building line is appropriated for all building purposes, and no erection or building, or portion of any erection or building other than boundary fences and architectural dressings, shall be built upon, project, or hang over, any other ground than that within the said lines except leave be first obtained in writing of the vendors, their heirs or assigns, nor shall any building other than a boundary fence be erected on any lot within 4ft. of any lot belonging to any other person, but nevertheless an owner or owners of adjoining lots may build or unite in building thereon semi-detached houses of uniform exterior, but so that no detached house or pair of semi-detached houses shall approach within 8ft. of any other house.

11. In case the lot of ground coloured yellow on the said map, and planned for the site of a church, shall not be granted for that purpose, but shall at any time be sold for building purposes, then the same shall be held on the same terms as are herein mentioned as to lot 60, except that there shall be deemed to have been marked thereon on the said map a dotted building line 40ft. distant from the front and flank roadways.

In July 1899 the defendant Bromet purchased the lot originally intended for the site of a church, and referred to in clause 11, from Ralph Raphael, the third party to the action. During the investigation of title, prior to such purchase, it appeared to the defendant's solicitor that the property was a plot of land subject to a building scheme, and he called for the production of the deed containing any restrictive covenants affecting the land. It was at the time believed by the vendor that the original deed no longer existed, and he produced what purported to be a copy of the restrictive covenants. The defendant subsequently purchased the land, but obtained an indemnity, dated the 16th Aug. 1899, from the vendor.

This indemnity was given by a letter written by the vendor to the defendant, and was in the following terms:

In consideration of your completing the purchase of the above property from me, I hereby state that the document purporting to be a copy of the building stipulations and conditions of sale of the Conservative Land Society annexed hereto and identified by my signature in the margin thereof is to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, a true and complete copy of the original building stipulations and conditions affecting the property, and I hereby agree to indemnify you, your heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, against all costs, damages, and expenses which you may suffer or incur by reason of the building stipulations and conditions affecting the property being other than those set out in the said copy. —Yours faithfully, RALPH RAPHAEL.

The defendant proceeded to build upon the lot four houses, which infringed the provision as to the building line imposed by clause 11. This provision did not appear in the copy which had been furnished by Raphael to the defendant, although the defendant was in fact aware of it, as prior to the commencement of building operations the defendant had ascertained that the original deed of 1854 was still in existence, and had obtained from it knowledge of the true provisions affecting his land. He had thereupon entered into negotiations with the liquidator of the Conservative Land Society to obtain his consent to the proposed new buildings, believing that power to consent to any variation in the scheme had been retained by the vendors under clause 5, and that the liquidator fell within the description of "the vendors, their heirs or assigns."

On the 29th Jan. 1902 the liquidator entered into an agreement giving such consent, and this agreement was duly confirmed by the court.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, as the owner of adjoining property on the estate, claiming an injunction restraining the defendant "from building or erecting or allowing to remain" upon his land any erection or building other than boundary fences within 40ft. of the Avenue and Ailsa-roads respectively.

At the trial it was held by the judge, after a lengthy argument, that upon the construction of clauses 4 and 5 the vendors had reserved no right to themselves to vary the building line.

There was evidence to show that the plaintiff or his predecessor in title had committed a breach of the building stipulations by erecting on the plaintiff's land a low building between the house and one of the boundary fences, which building went up to the boundary fence, and therefore contravened the end of clause 5.

Farwell, J. gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the breach of the covenant by the plaintiff was trivial, and did not disentitle him from having the building stipulations strictly enforced, and ordered so much of the houses as had been built and came within 40ft. of the two roads to be pulled down, and directed Bromet to pay Hooper the costs of the action.

On the question of the indemnity given by Raphael to Bromet, the following order was made:

"Upon the said question of indemnity this court doth declare that by virtue of the agreement dated the 16th Aug. 1899 in the pleadings mentioned the said third party, Ralph Raphael, is liable to indemnify the defendant against the costs directed to be paid by him to the plaintiff by the said judgment dated 18th June 1903 made in this action, and the costs as between solicitor and client incurred by him in defending such action, and that he is also liable to indemnify the said defendant against all costs, damages, and expenses incurred or to be incurred by reason of the defendant having built on land in the pleadings in the said action mentioned so far as he has built thereon in contravention of the covenants contained in the said indenture of the 31st Aug. 1854 in the said pleadings mentioned, and by having to remove such buildings pursuant to the said judgment; and for being unable in the future to build on the land sold by the said third party to the said defendant in accordance with the document purporting to be a copy of the building stipulations and conditions of sale of the Conservative Land Society annexed to the agreement dated the 16th Aug. 1899 in the said third party notice mentioned. And this court doth order that the said third party, Ralph Raphael, do pay to the said defendant, Mark Bromet, the amount paid by him for the plaintiff's costs and his own costs of this action, and of the third party proceedings, to be taxed by the taxing master, those of the said action as between solicitor and client. And it is ordered that the following inquiry be made (that is to say): An inquiry what damages the defendant has sustained by reason of his having built on the said land so far as he has built, and by having to remove such buildings pursuant to the said order, and for being unable in the future to build on the said land in accordance with the said document annexed to the said agreement dated the 16th day of August 1899. And it is ordered that the third party, Ralph Raphael, do pay to the defendant, Mark Bromet, the amount which shall be certified to be due for such damages as aforesaid."

From this order Raphael, the third party, appealed on the ground that he was not liable for the costs caused by several of the points raised in his defence by Bromet, which are particularly referred to in the judgments of the Court of Appeal.

The following clauses of the copy of the deed referred to in the indemnity were considered in the judgments of the Court of Appeal:

4. Building Lines.—The purchasers of lots coloured blue bind themselves to erect the external face of the front walls of all buildings on all plots and the flank walls of all buildings on the corner plots agreeably to the front and flank building lines shown.

10. Deed of Covenant.—Each purchaser on completing his purchase is to execute a proper deed of covenant for regulating the building and fencing upon his land and the repair of roads and drains, and keeping all the conditions herein contained, and powers for enforcing the performance of these covenants.

20. Site for a Church.—The vendors reserve for five years the portion of land coloured yellow planned for the site of a church with the power of granting it for that purpose, but should no grant be made within that time they reserve to themselves the power of selling it for building purposes subject to the same restrictions as lot No. 60.

23. The vendors reserve to themselves the power of allowing a variation of these plans and conditions except as to the building of a hotel, tavern, public-house, or beer-house on the portion of the estate now offered for allotment.

24. Any portion of the estate not disposed of may be dealt with by the vendors without reference to and totally independent of these conditions.
